A M A N A. Vhen we take the heauen in his most proper signification, we meane thereby the firmament, and the celestiall spheres, which couer and encompasse all things that are in the vniuersall world. But heauen is likewise taken oftimes for the aire, and for the regions next to the spheres, because they approach neere to the nature of them, and for that they bee elements drawne out of the first principles for the composition of corruptible things. And yet in the diuision of the world, there are commonly mentioned but two principall parts: that is, the celestiall and the elementary part, as we haue heretofore related. Now vnder this last part, whereof our ensuing discourse must intreat, we must vnderstand all that, which is comprehended within the concavity or hollow vault of heauen. vnder the Moone, even to the center of the earth: that is, the lower simple elements, which are Fire, Aire, Water and Earth, incessantly employed in the generation and corruption of all creatures, vnder the which part we comprise all the diuers and innumerable species of all bodies, both perfect and imperfect, materially engendred by the naturall commixture and power of the said elements. Which cannot be in number aboue foure; that is iust so many, and neither more nor lesse then there are first qualities predominant in them, which are heate, moisture, colde and drinesse; which neuerthelesse alone and by themselves doe not constitute an element: for they cannot haue the power both to doe and to suffer; as it is needfull that there should bee in the generation and corruption of all things: neither can the foresaid qualities consist aboue two together, for feare least contrary things should be found in one selfe same subiect, but being ioyned two and two, they are correspondent the one to the other, as the qualities of heate and drines, which are in the fire, the heat and moisture, which are in the aire: cold and moisture, which are in the water: and cold and drines, which are in the earth. But heate and cold which are actiue qualities, and moisture and drines, which are passiue qualities, are altogether contrary. And therefore can they not consist both together in one selfe same element: wherupon it cometh to passe, that the fire & the water, the aire and the earth are clean contrary one to another, which causeth also that the fire, as the most subtile & lightest element tending naturally vpwards, is placed aboue the three elements, and environeth the aire round about, which agreeth in heate with it: which aire encompaseth the water, agreeing therewith in moisture: and the water is disperfed about the earth, and agreeth therewith in coldnes and the same earth, as the most heauy and hardest element, is heaped and compacted in the midst of the whole world, containing the center thereof. It is certaine that the water environeth not the earth cleane round about, but is spread abroad by diuers armes, branches, and lakes (which we call seas) as well within, as about the same:

The number & qualities of the elements.

Situation of the elements.

for so it was necessary that some parts of the earth might be vncouered, for the health and habitation of living creatures; so as it hath pleased the soueraigne king of the world to ordaine for the benefit of all things.

There are then fower elements and first foundations of things compounded, and subiect to corruption. And by this number of fower perfectly consonant, the elementary world is divided into these fower partes: the fierie, the airie, the watric, and the earthy part: so also is this terrestriall frame distinguished into fower points, to wit; East, West, North, and South, as wee know the like to bee in the celestiaall bodies. And by their diuers motions and courses we obtaine the fower seasons of the yeare, to wit, the spring, sommer, autumn, and winter. From whence likewise proceedeth all aide and fauour to the substance and composition of the creatures comprised vnder these fower kindes, that is, corporall, vegetable, sensitive, and reasonable creatures, which subsist of these fower qualities, hot, cold, moist, and drie. We likewise see that all quantitie is diuided into fower, to wit, into a point, into a length, bredth, and depth. There are also fower sortes of motion: ascending, descending, progression and turning round. Moreouer if we will heere draw out some mysteries of the Pythagorians, wee shall know, that all the foundation of euery deepe studie and inuention, must bee settled vpon the number of fower, because it is the roote and beginning of all numbers, which exceede fower. For a vnity being ioyned to a fower, maketh vp ten: and in this number all the rest to ten are found: as may appeere in this figure [1, 2, 3, 4.] Above which number of tenne (as Aristotle in his problemes, and Hierocles in his verses vpon Pythagoras reciteth) no land, nor language hath ever proceeded. For the Hebrewes, Greekes, Latins, and Barbarians themselves being come so farre as to tenne begin againe with the vnity, saying (11, 12.) and so forward, imitating nature guided by her soueraigne, who by the order of tens parteth the fingers of the hands, and toes of the feete, as the same creator would distribute the terrestriall, celestiaall, and supercelestiaall world by this number of tenne, as the diuinitie of the Hebrewes doth teach, and as wee haue heretofore made mention. The which number likewise doth containe all manner of numbers bee they euen, odde, square, long, plaine, perfect, cubicall, pyramidall, prime, or compound numbers. And thereby, that is, by denarie proportions, fower cubicall numbers are accomplished: so fower is the roote of ten, and ten of an hundred, and an hundred of a thousand. For as 1, 2, 3, and 4, make ten: so by tens are hundreds made, and by hundreds, thousands. Moreouer foure containeth all muscicall harmony, because that therein is the proportion double, triple, quadruple, of so much and an halfe, and of so much & a third: whereof resulteth the diapason, the bisdiapason, diapente, diatesseron, and diapason together with diapente. For this cause Hierocles the interpreter of Pythagoras, doth so extoll this number of fower, that he affirmeth it to be the cause of all things, and that nothing can be said or done which proceedeth not from it, as from the roote and foundation of all nature. And therefore did the Pythagorians sweare by this number, as by some holy thing, making (as may be easily coniectured) allusion to that great fower-lettered name of the Hebrewes, from whom they received their instructions. Which name of the holy of holies, God eternal and most good, requireth no fewer letters among the Greekes and Latines, no not amongst the most barbarous nations: wherein one may directly beleue that great misteries are hidden.

The name of lettered.

But not to wander farther from our elementarie region: as therein we acknowledge fower elements, so many likewise are therein the Metaphysicks, to wit, the essence, the estate, the vertue, & the action. The naturalist also teacheth fower nurses of nature, to wit, power, growth, the forme growne, and the composition. And the Mathematicians haue these fower elements, the point, the line, the plaine, and the solid. And that which the point is in the Mathematicks, the same is the seminarie power in the Phisicks: the line is as the naturall growth: the plaine or superficies as the forme perfect in greatnes, and the solide or cube, or deepe body, as the composition. There are amongst the morall philosophers also fower seedes of vertues, prudence, temperatenesse or temperance, fortitude and iustice. And there are fower faculties found to iudge of things, that is, vnderstanding, discipline, opinion, and the senses. Artificers likewise accustome to settle their buildings vpon fower corners, to the end they may be firme and durable: wherein they imitate nature, which worketh so in all this world. And the soueraigne gouernor thereof hath willed, that there should bee fower foundations of the most perfect, eternall, and firme law of grace, to wit, the fower Evangelists. It then plainly appeareth, that not without great myserie the creator sealed fower foundations of all this mundane frame: which in admirable proportion doe accord together, as (all square numbers, which are inclosed by a proper number, referre themselves by a middle proportionall to both sides. For (as wee haue said) the elements are agreeable one to another, with their coupled qualities, whereof each retaineth one peculiar qualitie to it selfe, agreeth in the other, as by a meane with the next element. So that the fower elements are (as if each one of them had two hands, by which they held one another) as in a round daunce: or else, as if they were conioyned and linked together, as with chaines and buckles. And therefore the water is moist & cold, retaining the moisture as peculiar to it self and in coldnesse participating with the nature of the earth: by the moisture thereof, it is also allied vnto the aire, which also in some measure participateth in heate with the nature of fire. Wherefore as the earth accordeth in coldnesse with the water, so is water answerable in moisture to the aire, and the aire is correspondent in heate to the fire: retaining yet neuertheless each of them one proper and predominant qualitie. But aboue all, the Academicks haue inuented a goodly concord betweene these elements, in their discourses of the quadruple proportion; from which onely their muscalle proportions doe proceede: for if one passe farther, mens eares seeme to be offended. They say then, that the fire is twise more subtile then the aire, thrise more mooueable, and fower times more pearling. Likewise that the aire is twise more sharpe then the water, thrise more subtile, and fower times more mooueable. Againe that the water is twise more sharpe then the earth, thrise more subtile, and fower times more mooueable. And in this proportion haue they found out the harmonie of the elements, and shewed, that though the fire bee sharpe, subtile, and mooueable; the aire subtile, mooueable, and moist; the water mooueable, moist, and corporall; the earth corporall, immooueable, and drie; yet is there a certaine accord and vnion betweene them: because that betwixt the fire and the earth, the aire and water haue beene placed by such a couenant, that there is the same respect betwixt the fire and the aire, that is betweene the aire and the water, and betweene the water and the earth: and againe, that such as the earth is towards the water, such is the water towards the aire, and the aire towards the fire, in correspondencie of qualities, and harmonious contrarietie. Wherefore they conclude, that the harmonie on all sides so great among the elements that it is no maruell if in the proper places, and in their compounds, they maintaine and repose themselves with very great and friendly concord. Whereby it appeareth, that none can induce a goodlier reason, why the water doth not overflow the earth being higher then it; then to say, that it will not swarue from this agreement. But further concerning this matter, what shall wee say of those, which accept but of three elements; namely the aire, the water, and the earth; and reiect the elementarie fire? I would faine heare you (A R A M) discourse thereof.

the elementarie fire. Chapter. 39.*

Of such as say that there is no fire vnder the sphere of the Moone

A R A M. Betweene the lowest place and the highest it is necessary that there should be two places simply meane, to wit, the places not exactly lowest, nor highest. And for that consideration some of the learned conclude, that there be so many simple bodies made, and consisting of the prime and first matter, which are called by the Greeks (στοιχία) that is beginnings or Elements, & of those proceedeth the generation of all corruptible things. And if probable arguments may ought preuaile, each one must acknowledge foure elements in all compound bodies, as the most part of those who haue diligently considered the workes of nature, are of opinion. Now there is none that can doubt of the earth, of the water, and of the aire, because of their greatnesse and huge extension seene by every eie. But for the fire, wee onely see the increase, the power, and simple matter thereof, and his force or fountaine is esteemed to be in the concavities of the Moone aboue the aire. Yet some among the naturall Philosophers affirme and maintaine, that there is no fire vnder the orbe of the Moone: neither will acknowledge any other elementarie fire, but the fire of the celestiall bodies, and the heate of them, which they communicate to all the rest of the creatures. And therefore they assigne to these fires all the space, which is from the Moone to the highest heauen. Saying moreover, that sith the heauen heaven is a thing most pure, it is not convenient to place a thing most burning vnder that which is exempt from all qualitie. For nature doth alwaies ioyne extremities with things of meane qualitie: as is found betwixt the flesh and the bones, where shee hath placed a filme or thinn skinne; and betweene the bones and the ligatures, she hath put the gristles: so betwixt the scull and the braine, because it is softer then flesh, nature hath placed two filmes, the hardest whereof is neere to the bone of the head. Thereupon then they conclude, that the aire is much fitter then the fire to bee next the heavens, and serue as a meane to ioyne them with the earth and water. And against it they argue, that swiftnesse of motion is the cause or argument of the heate, and there is no other fire: others againe avouch, that this cannot bee. For (say they) although that solide substances may by motion be heated (as stones, leade, and liuing creatures) yet those which disperse or scatter themselves abroad, become thereby so much the colder, by how much they are more lightly mooued, witnesse the aire and the water. For all strong and swift windes are colde, and rivers that haue a quicke course are very colde. Againe those that deny the elementarie fire, do bring this argument; to wit, that the comets and flames which oftentimes doe appeare in the heavens, do cause in the aire very great and as it were intollerable heats: Therefore they demaund, what might happen if the vniuersall world, especially the elementarie, were enuironed by fire, who could hinder but that that fire would inflame the aire, and after it all other things, sith the heate of the celestiall bodies would thereto giue aide? They adde how Auerrois doth esteeme that all brightnesse is hot, and that the aire is such: and that euery moist qualitie doth least of all other resist heate. How then (say they) shall the aire resist the fire which is the most vehement, and most sharpe of all elements? It is true that this Arabicke author hath said, that sometimes the fire is not actually hot: but what then shall be his possibilitie? We say that some medicines are hot by possibilitie, because that being taken they heat wondrously. But by what creatures shall the fire be deuoured, to the ende to reduce it to the qualitie of medicines? Moreover, if the fire be not hot, then is not the water cold: which should be to confound all reason, and the very order of the world. Againe, they demand what it is that letteth the fire, that it shineth not, and that it is not scene in elementarie region? Againe, if fire bee in the aire, why then, the higher we mount, doe we finde the aire more cold, and why doe snowes more abound on the mountaine tops, then in the lowest places, yea vnder the torrid zone? Which neuertheless might not seeme strange: if one should consider, how snowe falleth in winter onely, and very colde haile in midst of summer, the cause whereof we shall heereafter discover. But (say they) if one should obiekt that the highest places are farthest remote from the reuerberation of the sunne: this may bee an argument of lesse heate, but not of coldnesse. In fine they adde, that if heate were in the highest of the aire in an elementarie body, it should principally there rest, for to cause the generation of thinges. Now for this reason it cannot be there, considering that the celestiall heat is it that doth engender, as all Philosophers mainetaine. Thereupon they conclude, that this imagination of fire aboue the aire is vaine. It seemeth also that bee a thing neuer so light, as is the fire; yet can it not mount so exceeding high: and to say that it was carried aloft, onely coniecturing so, and that the place thereof must be there, such Rhetoricall arguments are not woorth rehearsing in serious matters.

Reasons of such as deny the fire to enuiron the aire.

There are some also, which to the reasons by vs before touched in the beginning of this speech, doe reply; that it seemeth they doe conclude that there be foure simple bodies, but rather the contrarie. For, for the first betwixt two extremes one meane (and not two) is commonly assigned: which being considered in regard of the elements, there should onely be three in number. And for this vulgar opinion, that in all compound bodies there are esteemed to be foure elements; the heat which is in mixt and compound substances cannot consist of the elementarie fire: For if the fire should remaine in them, it should more rest in the herbe called (Euphorbium) and in Pepper, which are of an extreme hot and drie nature; and therefore one might more commodiously get fire out of them then out of most cold stones, which yet wee finde to be cleane contrarie. Moreover, the distillations wherein many straine themselves to search the foure elements, doe demonstrate but three substances onely, to wit, water for water, oyle instead of aire, and the earth which is in the bottome. Now if that any doe say that the reddest part of the oyle doth represent the fire, because it is very sharpe and very subtile, we will answere, that such piercing sharpenesse of fauour proceedeth from the vehement vertue of the fire, which operateth in the distillation.

Answer to many reasons which are alledged to proue foure elements.

Which

730 Of those that allow but of three elements.

Which likewise doth manifestly appeare in the oyle extracted from mettals: every part whereof is of a very sharpe savour. Wherefore if every thing of such a qualitie representeth the fire, it must follow of necessitie, that in every such essence no portion of aire may subsist. But all the world doth alleadge, that there may fower humours be perceived to remaine in the bodies of all living creatures. And yet what availeth that to proove so many elements? Nay, what if I should say with Thrusianus expounder of Galen vpon the art of Phisicke; that there are but three humours onely? But wee leaue this disputation, and let vs speake of a more strong and forcible argument, taken from the combinations and coniunctions of the elementarie qualities which are in number fower, as we have heard in our precedent discourse. They alone then and apart doe not constitute an element; for they cannot have the power to doe and to suffer: neither also can they consist more then two together; for else, contraries should remaine in onefelfe same subiect. Neither can heate bee ioyned with cold without some meane, nor dry with moist: Whereupon doth follow that the qualities not contrarie, being ioyned two and two together doe declare vnto vs fower well ordered combinations or couplings, which doe argue vnto vs the fower elements. But hearken what the aduers part answereth: Such conjunctions and copulations done onely shew themselves in mixtures and compound bodies: for some things being hot in the first degree, are also moist; and some being cold, are drie: others hot and drie; others cold and moist; and so consequently of the rest. But for the elements because that heat and great drie-nesse had reduced all things to an ende, in steede of ministring a beginning vnto them; Nature, or rather the author of Nature, hath ordayned a celestiall heat well tempered, by which all thinges should be engendred: And by it, and by putrefaction and motion, the creature called Fire is incessantly produced. Whereupon ensueth, that though there be a fire, yet neuertheless it is no element: And therefore they conclude, that there are but three elements. The earth most thicke and heauie seated below: the aire most thin and light placed above and the water meane betwixt these qualities situate betweene both. They also affirme, that vnto these elements it is common to haue no naturall heate: because there is no heat, but from the heavens, and consequently from the soule, and from brightnesse: That the earth because it is exceeding thicke and solide, and the aire, because it is beyond measure thinne, seeme to be least cold: but the water which is of meane substance betweene both, seemeth to be most cold. That the earth, because of some certaine thinnesse thereof, admitteth heat: and therefore is esteemed lesse cold then stones. And the aire because of the temperate cleerenesse, and for that by the thinnesse thereof it is easily changed, is esteemed not onely not to be cold, but to be hot, though in truth all the elements are cold by their own nature. Which coldnesse is nothing else, but priuation of heate, which heat doth wholly rest in the stars, & which is proper celestiall qualitie moouing the bodie, which aided by motion produceth fire. But (say they) many be deceived by reason of the violent heat, which sometimes maketh impression in the elements. For by action of the starres, some parts of the elements are mixed and participate with the nature of the celestiall bodies, as Pepper becometh hot: And yet such mingling cannot be said to be an element, but a thing composed partly of elements. And for the fire which lighteth by the striking and beating of stones, that it is likewise an heat of the stars in a body rarified by the celestiall power. By these reasons then they conclude, that two qualities do onely appeare vnto vs, the heate of heaven and the proper moisture of the elements: and as for drie and cold, that they be the priuations of those qualities: and that therefore a thing very hot, or very cold cannot properly be called an element: but that that may be said to be an element, which hath no neede of nourishment, which of it selfe is not corrupt, neither wandreth here and there, but retayneth a certaine place in great quantitie according to nature, and is prepared for generation. All which things not agreeing with the fire, because it is alwaies mooued, neither can subsist without nouriture; and burneth the aire which is next it, whereby beeing inflamed: it is called a flame (for flame is nothing else, but the aire inflamed:) it followeth that it cannot bee called an element, but rather an accidentall and great heat. Behold then how Philosophers do diuerly dispute vpon this matter: but our intencion is not to giue sentence therein especially against the ancient, and generally confirmed opinion, which admitteth fower elements. Wherefore as leaning thereunto, let vs (ACHITO) discourse how they may be considered by the perfect compositions which are in the world.

ACHITO. B.

According as we are taught by those, who have first diligently sought out the secrets of nature, we shall consider an elementarie fire, and the element thereof, approaching the heavenly spheres, by reason of the naturall agreement which they haue together, being much greater then there is of the heauens with the aire, the water and the earth. Now these fower elements doe demonstrate themselves by the like number of perfect compounds, which follow the nature of them: to wit, by stones, mettals, plants, and animals or sensitiue creatures. For stones haue their foundation or originall vpon the earthie corner of this worlds frame: because that agreeing with the nature of earth, they descend alwaies towards the center, except they bee such as are overdried and burned; as are the pumistones which are made spungie in caues full of aire. But when they are turned into dust, then resuming their proper nature of stones, they descende. Christall and the Beryll are also numbred among stones: because that though they may be engendred of water, they are neuerthelesse so congealed and in manner frozen, that being made earthy they descend downewards, which is not the manner of frost and snow. So is it with those stones that are bredde in the bladder, though they bee produced of a waterie humour. And all these kindes of stones become so close and solide in their nature, with such fastnes and binding, that they cannot be molten like mettals: although the said mettals descend downewards like stones. And therefore also vpon the second watrie angle of the elementarie world, mettals are builded: which though they bee said to be composed of al the elements, yet because they are principally made of water, they retaine the nature thereof, and will melt, as Abubacher doth excellently discourse, speaking thus [We see in mines, that by reason of the continuall heat of some mountaines, the thickest of the water steweth and boileth so, that in tract of time it becommeth quickesiluer. And of the fat of the earth so stewed and boiled together with heate, is brimstone ingendred, and through continuall heate also are mettals procreated. For gold that hath no default is ingendred of quicksiluer, and of brimstone that is pure, tough, cleere, and red. Siluer of the same liquid siluer, and of close, pure, cleere and white sulphur; wherein colour wanteth, and something of the closenesse and surenesse, and consequently of waight. Tinne, that is more vnperfect, is engendred of the same causes, and parts vnperfect because they are lesse concocted and attenuated. Leade, of the same terrestriall siluer, and full of filth, deprived of purenes and surenesse: and of grosse sulphur or brimstone somewhat red, whereto wanteth fastnesse, clearenesse and waight: which makes this metall vnperfect and impure. And Iron is procreated of the same quickesiluer, impure, tough, part earthy and burnt, white, and not cleere: which maketh this metall base and foule, failing in purenesse and in waight. All which mettals being made of quickesiluer which is waterie, doe (for this cause) retaine the nature of the water.] To this author accordeth Auicen in his Physickes, and in the epistle to Hazem the philosopher. But Gilgill the Spanyard supposed that mettals had beene engendred of cinders, because they smoke in water, and melt like the glasse, which is drawn from terrestriall cinders, and beaten stone. But this concludeth not: for metall sinketh and descendeth, by reason of that terrestriall part which it hath incorporated with the liquid part, and because that the pores which retaine the aire, are closed and shut vp. And for glasse, it is not extracted out of the earthy matter, but out of the radicall moitture, which is within the cinders and stones. For in euery compound are the fower elements, though the nature of one hath more domination therein. For this cause likewise plants are founded vpon the third angle of the world, called aire: for they doe not grow nor fructifie, but in open day, and doe properly retaine the nature of the aire, which they alwaies require, as being fittest and aptest for them. Yea the wood it selfe would presently corrupt and rot, being deprived of the aire, if the watrie humour do not succour it, which participateth with the aire. Finally vpon the fourth angle of this forwer faced edifice, to wit, vpon the fire, is the liuing sensitiue creature built, whose life (as many learned doe teach) is by meanes of fire, and obtained from the Emphyreall heauen, and from the spirit of life, which is a quickning fire, and distributeth life to all the mundane wheelles: as we may learne by the oracles of Ezechiel, saying, [And the spirit of life was in the wheelles.] Behold then, how vpon the fower bales of the elements are planted fower sorts of perfect compounds, to wit, stones, mettals, plants, and liuing creatures.

Diuersitie of the nature of stones.

Diuersitie of the mettals.

A different propertie of the plants.

Diuersitie of nature in animalibus.

Of the celestiall and super-celestiall elements.

True it is, that vnder every vniuersall kinde of these, there are diuers particular species distinct the one from the other: for although stones may be properly earthie, yet are they sometimes nominated of some other element, which most preuaileth in their composition. For doubtlesse all the elements doe meete together in the procreation of them, but chiefly earth and water. Whereupon obscure and thicke darke stones are called earthie stones; and cleere transparent stones, waterie; and some also are melted by a great fire, to be turned into glasse. Some also with raine falling drop by drop are engendred in the shells of oysters; as those pearles which are found in the Indian and Britaine sea. The chry stall and Beryll are made of water frozen, voide of pores or subtile passages, so that they can neither receiue heate nor be melted. It appeareth also, that there is fire in the composition of stones, which likewise is forced out of the flint being stroken with a gad of Steele. To which purpose Hermes amongst his secrets teacheth, that a stone doth sometimes spring out of the fire, mounting from earth too heauen, and then againe retaining to the earth, that nourished it. For mettals likewise, though they be waterie, some of them doe neuerthelesse retain the nature of fire, as gold and iron, one of which imitateth the fire of the sunne, and the other the fire of Mars. But tinne and copper are airie, this receiuing influence from Venus, that from Iupiter. Siluer agreeth with the Moone, Leade with Saturne, quicke-siluer with Mercurie: and yet all of them are endued with a waterie nature, and will melt, and doe differ in waight. For as one water doth differ in weight from another, so doth mettall, not onely in speciall, but also in vndiuisible proportion. For common gold differeth in waight from that which the Latines call (Obrysium) or else (Ofrysium of the Hebrew word (Ofir) which we call (fine golde) and which hath bene oftentimes purged and refined in the fire, and wasted not therein. The gold of Tharsis also doth differ from the golde of India and Hungarie, and of others. So likewise doe waters differ in goodnes and waight, according to the region and place wherein they are: and by how much they are neerer to the fountaine, by so much are they better and lighter. And by their waight (as Vulcanus will haue it one may know the goodnes of the aire: according to which he willett men to choose out places to build houses in. Concerning plants, although they may bee by nature airie: yet there are some, whose rootes, iuice, leaues, and blossomes are said to be hot in the first, second, third, or fourth degrees; and others are cold and drie; some also are moist: which diuersitie happeneth, according as the plant obtaineth, more or lesse of the nature of one of the elements. The like of liuing creatures. For though they may properly be said to bee of the nature of fire, yet are there some, which being more earthie, delight in the earth, as mowles, wormes, and commonly all creeping things. Likewise all fishes are nourished by the water: chameleon by the aire: the salamander by fire, as some affirme, because that hee long time indureth fire through his excessive coldnesse. There are some also which burne with great heate, as doves and lyons: some are cooled with moisture, as the lampe; and some are drie, as hares and deere. But neuerthelesse in regarde of their life they are all especially of the nature of fire distinguished by degrees: wherefore diuers names haue bene assigned to them, being borrowed from the elements or from their qualities.

And besides all this which wee haue heare discoursed concerning the elements, which may be found in the perfectly compounded substances of this elementarie world, many learned men affirme, that they are also resident in the celestiall and supercelestiall world. But that as they are heere thicke and grosse: so by a contrarie reason they are pure and cleaue in heauen, and in it liuing and every where well doing. They say then, that these celestiall elements are as the worthiest and excellent portion of those, which subsist vnder the moones sphere in the second degree, and which remaine also in the bowels of the earth as the most base and grosse lees of the elements. And that in heauen they are certaine vertues or powers; and in nature the seedes of things; and in the world below grosse formes. For (as they argue) if there were no elementarie powers in heauen, how then by the celestiall influences should these elements heere below bee engendred and transformed: in such sort that which now is aire may be conuerted into raine, the water exhaled into aire, the earth turned into wood, which nourisheth the fire, and from the wood riseth aire and ashes fall, which is earth? For these causes also it is very likely that the Astronomers distinguish distinguish the signes of the Zodiack and the Planets by the elements, attributing three signes to euery of them, as we haue already declared. But we shall finde enough to content vs concerning this matter, when we discourse particularly as touching the firme concord which remaineth betwixt the terrestriall elements and the Planets. Which (A M A N A) let be the subiect of your morrow discourse.

Of the agreement betwixt the Elements and the Planets. Chap. 41.

A M A N A.

S the celestiaall spheres doe follow that vniuersal & common course which the first heauen that containeth and encloseth them all doth begin, beside the motions that are proper and peculiar to each of them (as wee haue already heretofore declared: (so must we in like sort note, that the elements do follow the heauens, and obserue an order after them, euery one in his degree, hauing their motions also agreeable to their nature. And that likewise there is betwixt them and the celestiaall bodies, a certain accord & answerablenes of powers and qualities aptly proportioned by degrees, even as is found in all creatures compounded of them. We will then first entreat of this agreement betwixt the elements and the heauens beginning with the earth, which is correspondent to the moone in diuers respects. For as the earth draweth the water to it, and soketh it vp, in such sort that it is numbred by the Sages amongst those things which are neuer satisfied; to wit, with water: so doth the moone with a perpetuall attraction draw the water, making it sometimes to rise, to wit, when from the orientall Horizon she cometh to the midst of heauen, from whence descending to the occidental Horizon she carrieth it away with her with such violence, that it seemeth to fly from vs. Again, when the moone runneth in the point opposite to the midde heauen, she draweth the water away with her; then returning againe to the easterne Horizon, she causeth it to follow after her in like sort. When she encreaseth also she draweth vp the humours in trees and mens bodies; when she waineth, she chafeth them downe. Again, the earth and moone doe agree in the first qualities of cold and dry, wherewith the earth is actually, and the moone operatiuely replenished, which also (according to her nature being somewhat terrestriall) doth suppe vp the celestiaall waters, and all the influences of the bodies aboue her, which as neere to vs, she doth communicate with vs. For she receiueth from the other planets, and principally from the sun, that which she distributeth here beblow. And therefore Plato in his Banquet saith. That the moone participateth with the sun and with the earth. Moreover, the Moone is singular in varietie: whence it cometh to passe, that one while shee is crooked with hornes, another time divided into equall porportions or halfes; then being full round, she is here and there bespotted: sometimes she seemeth vmeasurably great in her round fulnesse; presently after she appeareth very small: now she sheweth very faire towards the North; afterwards againe she is couched in the South: so within a few daies she submitteth her selfe to coniunction, and by and by is she ful and big; presently after she is deliuered of the fruit which she had conceived. Now in this great changeablenesse, the Moone doth shew vs that the earth is like vnto her. For now being disrobed of her ornaments, shee appeareth blacke afterwards being painted and adorned with herbes and flowres, shee seemeth very faire. One part thereof is stony another part is marish. In one place it is leane, in another place fat; here abated in valls, there lift vp in mountaines: here fertile, and yonder barren. One part is checkered with diuers spots, this red, that black, one white, and another browne. One portion is close and clammie; another thionne and laundie. Moreover the earth is sometimes void and emptie, and then she receiueth the conjunction of the planets, whereby in short space being filled, she bringeth forth fruite. So then the moone amongst the stars, and the earth amongst the elements doe agree in many particulars.

The water cor-
to mercury.

Now as touching the water, it seemeth to be answerable to Mercury and to Saturne also. For the order of the planets, and the correspondency which they haue to things heere belowe, did require, that next after the earthly moone, watery Mercury should bee situate, whom poets haue named (the Arbitrer or vmpier of the waters) then followeth next airy Venus, and after her the sunne, which is of the nature of fire. Then againe Mars participating of the same force, hath his seat next about the sunne: airy Jupiter above Mars: watery Saturne over Jupiter and the signe bearing heaven about Saturne, as answering to the earth; then higher againe is the first moouable, of the nature of fire. It is certain that the nature of Mercury is by so much more hard to be deciphered, by how much his star is more hidden and hard to be seen, and that very seldome too. And therefore do Astronomers ascribe, that his influent power is secret, by reason that he easily accepting the nature of the planet wherwith he is conioined, or of the signe wherin he is resident, seemeth to operate. not according to his owne proper nature, but as the executor of the influence of another. Wherupon he is by them nominated (Hermes) to signifie, that he is as it were interpreter of the other stars intendements. For by the testimony of Ptolemy, he drieth vp being with the Sun, he cooleth with the Moone, he fauoreth the vnderstanding with Saturne, he bestoweth aduise & policy in warlike affaires, where stoutnes is required, with Mars, and conioined to Venus, he engendreth the *Anerogyne or Hermaphrodite, which must be vnderstood concerning him, who exerciseth subtilty of wit, which he receiueth from Mercury, in the second Venus, which is disordinate. For such a man is effeminate, retaining the property of both sexes. So that Mercury agreeing with the reasonable discourse and fauouring the same, as he is turned towards the inferiour; he likewise produceth diuers effects, in so much that his property cannot easily be comprehended. And yet may he very aptly be said to be of the nature of water, as many Philosophers are of opinion, considering that the order of the planets requireth (to obserue the harmonie and league of things heere below with those aboue) that hee should bee watery. Moreover, as water doth in washing, take away the spotte that couereth, in such sort that the naked bare forme doth appeere: so Mercury contributing fauour to the promptnesse and subtilty of mens wittes, is to them as an interpreter, taking away the vaile from strange languages, obscurenesse from riddles and parables, and difficulty from euery profound and mysticall speech: and opening that which is shut vp in the secret cabinets of God and nature, presenteth the naked truth to bee contemplated. Neither must wee thinke that the starre of Mercury performeth this, but so farre as it may operate in bodies by disposing, or else as an instrument of the diuine omnipotency, as we haue heretofore declared.

of both sexes.

Concordance of the aire with Venus.

Let vs now speake of the aire. It seemeth to bee answerable in nature to Venus, which is hot and moist, and by the foresaid order of the planets succession in course, that it must be referred to Jupiter. For this cause the Astronomers haue dedicated to Venus the airie liuing creatures. For euen as the aire and winde coupleth and conioineth things seuered, so doth the Venerian power: wherupon we will note, that the Academicks taught how that there were two Venuses, the one Etherian, and the other Aerian: the highest, cleanest, chafest, and most temperate according with Jupiter, and conioining the superiour, diuine and spirituall things: the lowest, most disordinate, slipperie, variable, and laciuous, which conioineth in lust the creatures here below. Of this Venus so many rebouldries are sung by wanton Poets, because shee is cause of all euill; euen as the other is cause of all good. To which speech the saying of Saint Augustine hath relation: namely, that two loues haue made two cities. For the well desposed and good loue of God, and the loue of one neighbour to the despising of ones selfe, hath edified the citie of God. But the peruerse loue of ones selfe, to the forgetting of God, hath reared vp the citie of the diuell. Moreover, the Grammarians deliuer this reason, why the power of this Starre is called Venus: because it doth concur in all things, bee they good or euill. And surely all is filled with loue, and nothing is void thereof, as all things are full of aire, which filleth the naturall appetite that abhorreth emptinesse. By loue (saith Boetius) are the heavens conioined, and the elements agree with bodies compound. Through it creatures dwell together, the citie is preferred, and the common wealth increased. Through loue God made the world, & doth gouerne it: and the summe of all that, which he requireth of vs is loue. Saint Denis in his Hierarchie speak.

speake thus. [The loue of God hath not permitted that the king of all things should remaine in himselfe without fruit. And as through loue he is spread abroad in all things without himselfe; so he delighteth to attract all things to himselfe, & principally man, in whom all is inclosed. And therefore when hee shall bee vnited (with God) even so shall all other things be. Whether then that we speake of Diuine or angelicall, or spirituall, or quickning, or naturall loue, we meane a power engrafted, and conioyning, which moueth the superiorthings to providence and care, for the good of the inferiour, disposeth equall things in a sociable communion, and in fine admonisheth inferior things, that they turne themselves to those that are better and superiour.] Thus speaketh this great Doctor and Philosopher. But let vs pursue the subiect of our discourse. Wee haue declared, that the Academics haue taught double Venus. The like may be said of the Aire, for we consider it in 2. parts, the one thick and foggy, which is next the earth, and the other pure & ætherian next vnto the stars: which being heated by force of the winde which mixeth it selfe in all things seemeth to be very fit for the propagation and maintenance of nature: for which reason also the wind and the aire are called by one name of the Hebrewes, who call all things according to their properties.

Finally, the elementary fire is answerable to the Sunne, and to Mars, who are both of the nature of fire. For as the Sunne is the true and celestiall fire, boylng all that which appertaineth to the viands of this great animall the world; so this elementary fire causing all things to boyle by his great heat, doth perfect the nourishment of creatures liuing in the earth. Both the one and other fire heateth; but this driving the humours inward, and the other drawing them out. This imparteth his commodity to that onely, which is neere it, but the superiour bestoweth his vertue vpon the farthest remote bodies, in such sort that the force of his beames pierceth even to the bowels of the earth, where it boyleth & maketh mettals, which afterwards the elementary fire purgeth. Moreover, as Apollo (so named) as of a which is a primitiue letter in compolition, and of ἄλλος, which signifieth multitude, as beeing hee, who alone containeth the power of the heauens and of the starres; or else because that his vertue and power consisteth of many fires, by which hee giueth light to all the stars, whose naturall vigour produceth not their effects, till such time as they be filled with the powerfull seede of this faire Phebus, who is so called of his beauty and amiableness which shineth in him, at he is also named Sol, as holy shining, or else by a name amongst the Hebrewes, which one may interpret, that which properly doth subsist, because that the light and benefit thereof is proper and peculiar vnto him.] As this faire planet (I say) was acknowledged by the ancient Poets and Philosophers, for the inuentor of phisicke, because of the quickning heat and well disposing power thereof: so the fire here beneath doth aptly patterne him, by reason that heating the cold frozen creatures, it doth in a manner restore their life vnto them. So it is heate that giueth life and fruitfulness. For egges are not conuerted into chickens, nor the silkworme into a butterfly, neither do plants grow, nor yet are liuing creatures nourished and warmed; except either by the superiour, or by the quickning, or by the elementary heat, which by a certaine simpaty doe seeme to be of one selfe same kinde, as it were through correspondencie. Yea the fire is so fruitfull, that it engendreth it selfe, and giueth power to other naturall things to engender, not by the heat thereof onely, but by the force of the light, which it receiueth from him who hath said, [I am the light of the world.] Wherefore Moses being desirous to make manifest, that all things had beene produced by the benefit of the light after that the matter which hee calleth earth turned out of darkenesse, was made, he saith that presently the light was created: as that by meanes of which life, and forme must be giuen to all things, and aptnes to be seene. Which vitall vigour did no doubt consist in the diuine fire which is called (the which resting vpon the face of the waters, infused into all things the life and the formes, by which every thing might be discerned from other. But let vs now returne to our elementary world, and particularly behold the nature of the foure elements, and of things engendred in them and by them. Then haue we enough to stand vpon for the common opinion, of those, who establish this number of foure in that which hath beene already declared, and now also in this discourse. Let vs first then (A M A N A) heare you discourse of the fire and of the aire, and of their marvellous effects.

and of their motions, and of the Windes. Chap. 42.*

AMANA MAny Philosophers doe deuide all that, which subsisteth vnder the concaue of the Moone, into three parts) one of which they call the highest, the other the middle, and the third the lowest part. The highest they place about the middle region of the aire, and make as it were the same element partaker with the most pure fire, which the auncients nominated (Ether) because that there the elements are pure, subtile, thinne, and rare, and for that the aire there is very temperate and cleere, agreeing with the nature of heauen: as to the contrary in the lower part, which is that where we inhabite, there is not any sincere element (for a sensible element is not pure) but all things are there compounded and mixed with the muddy and grosse part of this mundane body. And concerning the middle region of the aire, it is that very place where the meteors and high impressions doe appeere. So then about, the elements are pure; beneath, the perfect and composed bodies doe faile, by reason of their mixture & of the elementary simplicity: and in the middle they compound themselues vpperfectly, in such sort, that one may say that they possesse the middle place betwixt the nature of the elements and of things compounded. Now as we haue said before, and as the common saying of people is, the heauen is often taken for this supreme and middle region of the aire, and for the things which are to them conioined, and do depend vpon their effects. So that in this regard we may vnderstand first two of the lower elements, to wit, the aire & the fire, then all things ingendred in them, and by them: as winds, thunder, lightnings, haile, whirlewinds, clouds, tempests, raine, dewes, frosts, snowes and all kinds of fire and such like, which arise & appeere in the aire. And therein we may also comprise all the creatures which conuerse in it, as birds and all creatures that fly, even as the holy Scripture teacheth vs, when it maketh mention of the birds of heauen.

Of the proper nature of the fire, and of the aire.

That the aire is alwaies moued.

What winde is.

Now the element of fire is knowne to haue his place neere to the moone, being by nature hotte and dry, and is for this cause lightest, hauing his motion quicker then all the element, because that lightnes and quicknes is proper to these two qualities (heat and drines) and therefore also the property thereof is to mount alwaies vpwards, vntill that it hath attained to the place destinated vnto it, being most conuenient for the nature therof, & which ioineth next vnto the spheres. Next to fire the aire possesseth the second place, & agreeth in the nature with the fire, in that it is hot: but it is contrary thereto in that it is also moist. And therefore the motion thereof followeth that of the fire, but it is not so light and quicke by reason of the humiditie which maketh it more heauy and slow. And yet it ap-peareth that it is alwaies moued, because that in narrow places small windes doe blow without ceasing. For considering that the aire hath the motion thereof tending alwaies vpwards, and that it is continually moued vp and downe, it bloweth in a great space very gently: but passing through a creuise or straight place, all the violence therof being drawn together by reason of the narrownesse of the place, driueth out and flieth vehemently vpon vs: after the manner of the waters of great floods, which, when it seemeth that they can scarce flow, being vrged through a narrow place, or through sluices are constrained to run out by much force, with noice and roaring. Moreover, according as the aire is moued, either by the heate of the Sunne, or by the vapours and exhalations which this heat causeth to rise out of the waters, and out of the earth, or by the waves of the Sea, or by the causes of the earth, and such like causes, we perceiue the aire diuersly agitated. For wee must note that the windes are nothing else but the aire, which is moued and driven more violently then ordinarie, and which hath his motion more sudden, more violent and strong, being driven and pressed forwards according as the causes are more great or small, and according to the places from whence they proceede. And this is the reason why the aire is sometimes so peaceable, that one cannot feele so much as one onely small puffe of winde:
but it is as calme as the Sea, when it is not tossed with any winde or tempest. As is evident

evident by those vanes and weathercockes which are set in the tops of turrets & houses: for when the winde bloweth not, their plates are nothing mooued: and yet the aire doth neuer faile to blowe by reason of the perpetuall motion therof: but in so much as it is not hoisted vp and downe, it passeth and flieth lightly away, without any noise or bruite towards that part wherto we see the point of the vane enclined. Sometimes also one may feele some small pleasant and gentle winde to blow without any violence, which is very delectable, recreative, and profitable, not onely in regard of men and other liuing things, but in respect also of all the fruits of the earth. At another time likewise the violence of the windes is so great, that it raiseth vp whirlewindes, stormes and tempests, which driue the aire with such fury and roughnes, that it seemeth they would ouerthrow and confound heauen and earth together, beating downe and carrying away all that is before them: like a great deluge and water flood, which beareth away with it all that it meets with. But though one may suppose so, during such tempests, yet the course of the windes are not so confused, but that all of them obserue their order and certain places, out of which they issue and proceed, & their bounds likewise whereat they stay, and wherein they are confined, as the element of which they are engendred. And therefore by experience we see, that they follow the course of the Sun, and that they are distributed, and disposed according to all the parts of the world, as we usually diuide it, hauing respect to the moouing of the spheres. For as we diuide the course of the sun, and all the regions of the earth into East, West, North and South; so must we consider the fower principall winds, which proceed out of these fower places one opposite to another. Besides which there are certain others which are called collaterall windes, because that each of the first hath them vpon the one or other side of them, so that those who haue ordinarily written concerning the windes, doe appoint to the number of twelue common and ordinary windes, saying also, that there are others which are proper to certain regions and countries, according to the nature of their situations and places: as wee may hereafter find matter enough thereof amply to intreat.

Of the diuersity of the winds, and of the order and bounds of them.

But here it will be good to touch one difficulty, which may bee alleadged vpon our discourse, touching that which we haue saide concerning the qualities of the aire. For sith that it is hotte and moist by nature, and that the windes are nothing els but the same aire mooued and puffed forwards: what may be the cause that the windes doe not all of them retaine the nature of the aire? For we knowe by experience, that there are as many diuers qualities in the windes, as in all the elements: for some are hotte and dry; others hotte and moist; others moist and cold: and some cold and dry. Hereupon we may note, that all creatures which subsist of a sensible and corporall nature are commonly diuided into two kindes, which comprise them all. The one are simple, and the other compound; of the first sort are the elements taken euery one alone in their proper and particular nature, such as wee haue already declared. And all other creatures compounded of the elements conioined together, are of the second kinde. Wherefore if the elements were pure, not any way mixed one with another, then would each of them retayne his naturall qualities purely. But because they are intermingled one with another, they haue their qualities likewise mingled. And therefore by how much the higher the aire mounteth, by so much the more it is pure, neate, subtile, and thin; and by how much the lower it descendeth and approacheth the water and earth, by so much the more it is grosse and thicke, and partaketh more of the elements nere to which it remaineth. And according as it is warmed by the heate of the Sunne, or by any other heate, or else as it is cooled by the absence and default thereof; euen so doth it become either more hot, or more cold. The like also may be said concerning the naturall moisture thereof. For according as it is more or lesse mixed with water, or neere vnto it; so doth it receiue either a more moist, or a more drie qualitie. So therefore according to the places out of which the winds proceed and issue, and through which they passe, they are hotter or colder; drier or moister; pure or impure; healthfull and holsome, or pestilent and infectious, yea euen stinking. And for the same cause also it cometh to passe, that as the diuersitie of lands and countries is disposed, so winds, which are felt in one place warme, are in another place cold: and so it is of their moisture and drines. By the same reason also those that are healthfull for some, are vnholosome for others; and those which bring with them faire & cleare weather in one place, doe in another place bring raine and tempests. For the propertie of some of them is, according to the countries wherein they blow, to chase away the cloudes, and make the aire cleare

and the weather faire, whereas others doe assemble and heap them together. Whereupon ensueth, that some bring raine with them, other snowe, and others againe haile and tempests, according as God hath ordained the causes in nature, as the sequelle of our discourse shall minister occasion againe to speake of. Wherefore pursuing the order of our speech, wee wil consider those things which are conioyned to the fire and aire, and doe depend vpon their effects: as are thunders and lightnings. Whereof (A R A M) doe you discourse.

Of thunder and lightning. Chap. 43.

A R A M. T Here is a certaine vniuersall loue and appetite in all creatures, which inciteth them all to loue their owne kinde, to desire it, and search after it. But as their natures are diuers, euen so is the loue and the appetite which is in them. And therefore there are as many sorts of desires, as there are diuersities of natures. And thence it is that the fire and the aire doe naturally desire the highest places, and doe thither tend euermore, as the water and the earth doe require the lowest, and doe thereto descend incessantly: neither can these elements finde any stay or rest vntill they be arrived at those places, which are appointed vnto them by nature. And therefore what hinderance soeuer there may bee, yet every thing doth alwayes seek to returne to his naturall home, and therein doth all possible indeuour. Now heere wee are to consider the cause of thunders, lightnings, tempests, earthquakes, and such like motions and perturbations in the elements. For all these things happen, when the creatures, which by their contraries are hindered from pursuing their owne kinde, doe fight with those which keepe them backe, as if there were open warre betwixt them. Which causeth that that which by force can make way doth at last vanquish. But because of the resistance which there is, this cannot bee performed without great violence, and marvellous noise: from whence proceede many admirable effects, and namely, thunder, which hath ministered occasion to many great spirits to search out the causes somewhat neerely. But mens opinions, as in a very deepe matter are diuers hereupon. For some maintaine, that thunder is caused by the blowes and strokes that the fire maketh being inclosed within the cloudes, which it cleaueth, so making it selfe to appeare as is seene in lightnings. Aristotle in his Meteors writeth, that thunder groweth and proceedeth of hotte and dry exhalations ascending out of the earth into the supreme region of the aire, being there repulsed backe by the beames of the stars into the cloudes. For these exhalations desiring to set themselves at liberty, and to free themselves, doe cause this noise, which is often stopped by nature, whilest they fight with the cloudes: but when they can gaine issue, then doe they make the cloude to cracke, like a bladder full of winde that is broken by force. Moreover Pliny imitating the opinion of the Epicure teacheth, that those fires, which fall from the starres (as wee see often in calme weather) may sometimes meete with the cloudes, and fall vpon them and that by the vehemency of this blow the aire is mooued. And that this fire plunging it selfe into the cloudes causeth a certaine thicke and hissing smoke, which maketh a noise like an hot iron thrust into water: From whence the whirlewindes which wee see in the aire doe proceede. But when the winde or vapour inclosed in the cloudes, will needes get out by force, then this causeth thunder. And if there come out fire which breaketh the cloude, then is it lightning. But when these inflamed vapours do shew forth a long traine of their fire out of the cloud, then this is that which we call a flash of lightning. Whereupon ensueth that these lightning flashes cleaue the cloudes: but the fire of thunder teareth and renteth them, and causeth them to cracke.

But referring these arguments to Philosophers, wee may fitly say, that the true cause of thunder is the winde inclosed, which seeketh to issue out. But that which is most admirable therein, is the great violence of the flashes thereof, and the strange accidents which happen by the fire thereof. For it doth not onely pierce more then any other fire, by reason of the passing swift motion thereof: but it is much hotter then all other fire. For it is to be noted that there is a difference in heate; and that not onely by reason of the matter one fire is hotter then another, as that which is in the iron is hotter then that which is in straw; and that which is in oken wood is hotter then that which is in willow; but euen as in ice we find some scarcely frozen, other some hard; and other againe very hard: so is there in fire that is scarce

scarce fire, as when the iron beginneth to waxe somewhat red, and another fire that is shining, and other that shines very bright. Wherefore we must note that fire exceeds in heat and in force sixe manner of waies. 1. By nature as I haue said (for the most ardent burneth quickest & soonest.) 2. By the soliditie of the matter (as that which is in iron.) 3. By motion (for thereby it is made more piercing.) 4. By greatnes either proper to it selfe, or caused by continuance of time, (which is common to every fire.) 5. By hindrance of respiration, and by constraint together, (as is manifest in lyme, which is kindled with water: for the heate being gotten in, and hid in the fornace, being of the kinde of fire, is enclosed and gathered within the lyme, so that it returneth into fire, by the motion and mixture of the water.) Now the constrained motion must not onely penetrate very much, but also it enkindleth heat, and (as I haue declared) it maketh one fire hotter then another. And therefore it may be no great wonder, if the lightning of thunder be of very much force and violence, and that the fire thereof being very different from the nature of other fires, doth effect strange things. For it is not onely more pearcing by reason of the quicke motion thereof, but it is also much hotter then all other fire. Whereupon it commeth, that it can kill any kinde of creature by the onely touch thereof. And sometimes the purse remaining whole and sound, it melteth the money that is therein: which is not fabulous as many thinke, nor yet on the other side very much to be admired. For that which hurteth, doth corrupt either by meanes of the quantity, or for the long continuance thereof. And therefore the thunder fire which is most subtile, breaketh not the purse: for by reason that it hath very quicke motion, it staieth not on it, and therefore cannot it endamage it so. Moreover, as the aire doth demonstrate vnto vs, that by reason of the subtiltie thereof, it passeth through the purse, without any resting vpon it, and entreth thereinto, filling it when it is emptie, though it be fast shut (which coulde not bee, if it found not passage through insensible waies and holes, sith the mouth of the purse is very close shut.) So likewise one little sparke of thunder fire, farre more subtile then the aire, may easily enter into the purse, where finding metall it fasteneth therein, causing it to melt by the extreame violence and sudden force thereof.

Of the violence and force of thunder.

So then the solid bodies, as iron, siluer, and gold are by so much the sooner spoiled and molten by the lightning, by how much they doe more withstand, and make resistance against it. But in those bodies which be rare, full of holes, soft and weak, the thunder passeth quicke ouer them, without hurting them, as is seene in the garments that men weare, and in very drie wood. For other wood burneth, by reason that the moisture which remaineth therein doth resist and kindle. Whereupon it followeth (if we beleue Plutarch) that such as sleepe are neuer stroken with thunder: because that the sleeping man is loose, and becommeth soft and vnequall, and in manner dissolued, with his pores open, as if his spirit failed, and left him: so that the lightning findeth no such resistance in him, as it would doe if he were awake. Whereunto this may be also added, that he which sleepeth, hauing no feare, astonishment, nor dread in him, is by this meanes oftentimes defended from thunder. For it is certaine, that many haue died with feare onely and apprehension which they haue taken thereof, without suffering any violence. Wherefore considering that the sense of hearing is of all other senses the most subiect to suffer violent passions, and that feares and dread which proceede of noise, doe bring the greatest trouble to the soule: thereupon hee which waketh and apprehendeth very much, becommeth bound and thicke in his body: so that the lightning falling vpon him, giueth a greater blow and a ruder stroke, in so much as it findeth greater resistance.

It is wonderfull to consider the strange cases, that many authors report to haue hapned through thunder. But amongst all, that is very admirable, which Julius Obsequius reciteth of the daughter of Pompeius Lionis a Knight of Rome. For shee returning from certaine plaies and turnayments celebrated at Rome, was suddenly stroken from her Palfrey with a thunderclap, starke dead, without any apparance of any wound, or fracture of member. But when her father caused her to bee stript to burie and interre her, they perceiued her tongue to come forth at the bottome of her wombe: whereby they knew that the thunder and fire had stroken her directly through the mouth, and so had issued out at the lower passage: a thing exceeding fearefull, and worthy of great maruell. That which D. Bartas, the honour of the poets of our age, hath written in his nolesse learned then Christian weeke, to haue bene scene of the effects of thunder by a woman, though it may rather minister cause of laughter then of sorrow, yet is it very maruellous. For he recounteth that the flame singed away all the haire about this womans secrets at one instant, without doing her any harme. But omitting these discourses, I will note certaine particularities, which some philosophers affirme touching thunder. They say then, that it neuer or very seldom toucheth pillars, nor the keeles of ships, by reason of the depth of the one, and roundnesse of the other. So that the blow thereof running along the pillars doth very seldom strike them: as also not being able to descend aboue five cubits vnder ground, and the bottoms of ships being very lowe it scarcely euer falleth there. And therefore it is a sure remedie against lightning to hide ones selfe in deepe caues. It is also to be noted, that although the brightnesse of the lightning be seene before the noise of thunder bee heard, yet proceede they not one before another, but are both together. And the reason hereof is easie to vnderstand. For because that sight is quicker and sharper then hearing, the eie doth sooner behold the brightnes of the lightning, then the eare doth heare the sound of the thunder; as we see plainly when a man cuts downe a tree, or beateth vpon any thing that resoundeth, especially if we be farre off. For we shall see him stricke the stroke sooner then we can heare it: as likewise we proue in ordinance, and in all guns and peeces, whose fire we shall see, before we heare the noise of their shoot; notwithstanding that they are both performed together. But we haue dwelt long ynough on this matter, concerning that which philosophers doe teach. We must now consider what the true meteors of Christians are, as we haue already discoursed of their Astronomie and Astrologie: wherein we shall learne the supernaturall causes of those thunders and lightnings, which God sendeth when and how he pleaseth: as you (ACHITOB) can relate vnto vs.

ACHITOB. THE Philosophers call Meteors, by a Greeke name, that part of naturall philosophie, which entreateth of the aire, and of the things engendred therein, and appertaining thereto: as namely the cloudes, raine, snow, thunders, tempests, lightnings, and such like, because that they are ouer and aboue vs. For the signification of the Greeke word (Meteoron) importeth so much. But the principall profit that like Christians, we must desire and purchase from this part of Philosophie, is, that we learne by the contemplation and consideration of the workes of God, of which we now intreat, what is his power, wisdom, bountie, and benignitie towards vs, and how it manifesteth it selfe before our eies; not onely in the highest heauens, wherein the sun, moone, and stars are contained (as we haue heretofore shewed) but also in the aire and in all the elements placed vnder the spheres. For by this knowledge we may reape very great fruits. First, in that we are assured, that all these things are in the power of our father, who is the creator of them: & that they are all created for our good like the rest of his workes, and not for our ruine and perdition. Then we learne by so many rare workes and marvellous effects, to feare and loue the author of them only, and nothing else, except in him, and for the loue of him; acknowledging and firmly believing that he alone is the author and governour of all nature. For wee beholde how terrible and fearefull he sheweth himselfe by thunders and lightnings. And againe, how louing, gracious, and benigne hee declareth himselfe to be, by raine, dewes, and such like blessings, by which he giueth nourishment to men, & to all other creatures. For these causes also the kingly prophet calleth thunders, lightnings, tempests & great inundations of waters (the voice of the Lord) & in another place he speaketh of the Lord, as of a magnificent and maiestical Prince, speaking great, like the sound of thunder, and casting fire out at his mouth, with great floods and deluges of water: saying againe in another place, That the Almighty maketh great cloudes his chariot, and that hee walketh vpon the wings of the winde, that he maketh the spirits his messengers, and a flaming fire his ministers. By which fire, no doubt, but the Prophet meaneth the lightning, which the Lord sendeth, when, and where it pleaseth him, to cause men to loue him, and to punish them like their iust iudge: as he declared in effect, when he rained downe fire and brimstone vpon them of Sodome and Gomorrah, and the other Cities round about them: which are proposed to vs in the Scriptures for examples of the iudgements of God, as that of the flood.

For this cause also David addresth his speech to the great and mighty, to the proud and and loſtie, which haue God in contempt, ſaith [Gine vnto the Lord ye ſonnes of the mightie, giue vnto the Lord glorie and ſtrength: giue vnto the Lord glorie due vnto his name: worſhip the Lord in his glorious ſanctuarie:] conſequently deducing the wonders that God doth by the voice of his thunder, and how that it ſparkleth with flames of fire, by reaſon of the lightnings, which proceede out of the cloudes when they open, and rent themſelves with ſo great noiſe, whereat the deſerts, and mountaines tremble: the hinds calue and bring forth before their time for feare and dread, and the foreſts are diſcovered, their teeres being ouerturned and broken, as they are very oftentimes with tempeſts, and whirlwinds, as if the Author of all nature did blow through them. For it is he (as is written in Eccleſiaſtics) that ſendeth out the lightnings as hee liſteth, who hauing opened his treaſures, the cloudes flie out like birdes; at ſight of whome the mountaines leape, and the ſouth winde beloweth according to his will: and the voice of his thunder maketh the earth to ſuffer: which is as much to ſay, as that it is mooued and trembleth in regard of men. Whereby wee may learne what ſhall become of them all, if they enterpriſe to ſtand vp againſt God. For ſurely their force cannot but bee much leſſe then that of the high mountaines and great trees, which might ſeeme to the ignorant able to oppoſe themſelves againſt thunders, whirlwinds and tempeſts.

For this cauſe alſo Elihu ſaith in the booke of Iob. [At this alſo mine heart is aſtonied, and is mooued out of his place. Heare the ſound of his voice, and the noiſe that goeth out of his mouth. Hee directeth it vnder the whole heauen, and his light vnto the endes of the world.] Now he meaneth by this light, the lightnings which our God cauſeth to appeare in one moment and inſtant from the eaſt to the weſt, and from the one ſide of the world to the other (as the Scripture declareth otherwhere) and it is eaſie to note, by reaſon that he proceedeth, ſaying: [After it a noiſe ſoundeth: hee thundreth with the voice of his maieſtie, and he will not ſlay them, when his voice is heard. God thundreth maruellouſly with his voice: hee worketh great things, which we know not.] And who (I pray you) would not wonder to ſee the fire and water, which are of contrarie natures mingled one with another, and lodged both in one lodging, and proceeding out of one place together? For where remaineth this fire, which ſheweth it ſelfe in lightning? commeth it not out of the cloudes wherein it is encloued before they be opened, and burſt by the thunder? And of what ſubſtance is the cloud? Is it not of water maſſed vp together, which couereth and keepeth in the fire, as in an harth? For doe not wee oftentimes be hold while it raineth, and great ſtoudes and ſtreames of water do fall, ſo that it ſeemeth that all the cloudes, and the whole aire ſhould melt and reſoule into water, that great lightnings of fire flaſh, appeare, and run euery where about like burning darts and arrowes? For while the hot exhaltations are in- cloued in the cloude, and retained therein perforce, with the violence & contention which is betwixt theſe contraries, the noiſe of thunder is made. And when the matter is ſo abundant in the cloude, that it maketh it to breake and open, and that it may reach to the earth then is there not onely thunder and lightning, but alſo thunderbolts, and which are of diuers very marvellous and fearefull kinds. For ſome bring with them that fire which is not eaſie to bee quenched, as we haue already declared: others are without fire, & pierce through the moſt ſolid and firme bodies, ſo that, there is no force which can reſiſt them. And ſometimes alſo it happeneth, that thoſe which are ſtroken therewith, be they men or beaſts, remaine all conſumed within, as if their fleſh, ſinewes, and bones were altogether molten within their ſkin, it remaining ſound and whole, as if they had no harme, ſo that it is very hard to finde in what part the bodie was ſtriken.

Causes of the noiſe and of the lightning of thunder.

We are not then to hold in ſmall accompt that the holy ſcripture propoſeth God vnto vs ſo often thundring, and lightning, when it would declare vnto vs his maieſty and how terrible hee is, and to bee feared. For it is certaine, that he hath many weapons, and of diuers ſorts, very ſtrong, and ineuitable, when he will puniſh men, and that his only will is ſufficient to ſerue him, when, & how he pleaſeth. And therefore alſo we muſt acknowledge beſides theſe naturall cauſes which make and engender thunder, the prime, eternall and ſupernaturall cauſe of all things, from which proceed ſo many ſignes of the merueilous iudgements of God through the miniſterie of his creatures, oftentimes contrarie to that, which ſeemeth to be ordeined by the lawes of nature. For when hee will thunder vpon his enemies hee breaketh and ſuddenly conſumeth them in ſtrange manner. And therefore it is written, that the Lord ſhall deſtroy thoſe who riſe vp againſt him, and that he ſhall thunder vpon them from heauen, and in the battell which the children of Iſrael had againſt the theists and Tirants,

Moreover we doubt not but that euill spirits doe sometimes raise vp tempests, thunder and lightning, because that the principall power of them is in the aire. And therefore when it pleaseth God to slacke their bridle, they raise vp terrible and wondrous stormes. Which is apparently demonstrated vnto vs in Job, whose seruants and cattell Sathan burned with the fire, which he caused to fall from heaven: and by a great winde that hee raised, he ouerturned the house vpon his children. And therefore also the scripture calleth the diuel, Prince of this world, and of darkenes, and of the power of the aire: teaching vs also, that wee must fight against the euill spirits which are in the celestiall places. It is no maruaile then, if euill spirits ioyne themselues with tempests, to hurt men to their vttermost abilitie. For which cause Dauid calleth the inflaming of the wrath of God, choler, indignation and anguish (the exploit of euill angels.) Wherefore it is certaine that when God hath a meaning, not onely to punish the wicked, but also to chastice his owne, or to try their faith constancie, and patience, he giueth power to diuels to this effect: yet such, as that hee alwaies limiteth them, so that they can do nothing, but so farre as is permitted them. Now he permitteth them so farre as hee knoweth to be expedient for his glory, and for the health of his: or so much as the sinnes and infidelity of men deserue, that he may chastice and punish them, and bring vengeance vpon them for their iniquities. And therefore mee seemeth that to such meteors the Epicures and Atheists should be sent, who mocke at the prouidence of God; as likewise the tyrants of this world, who treade all iustice vnder foote, to make them thinke a little, whether there be a God in heaven, & whether he be without power, and without meddling in the gouernment of the world. For I cannot beleue that there is any one of them, but would be waked out of his sleepe, how profound soeuer it were, when he should heare God shoote out of the highest heavens, and should vnderstand the noise of his cannons, and should behold the blowes that hee striketh. For hee is in a place so high, that all the wicked together cannot make battery against him, nor yet auoid his ineuitable strokes, who can slay them with the feare onely which they shall haue of his noise, without touching them. But though they cannot assure themselues in their hearts against this soueraigne maiestie and power of the eternall, yet are they so peruerse and wicked, that rather then that they will render to him the honour and glory which is due, they forge vnto themselues a nature, to which they attribute his works or else beleue that they happen by chaunce, as things comming by hap hazard, without any diuine prouidence. But leauing such manner of people, wee will pursue our discourse concerning things engendred in the higher elements, entreating of Snowes, Mistis, Frosts and Haile, the discourse whereof (A. S. E. R.) I referre to you.

Of snowes, mistis, frosts, ice, and haile. Chapter 45.

Job. 38.

A. S. E. R. Sith that God is not subiect to the nature which he hath created, but doth euer rest the Lord and master thereof, who can performe both without it, and with it all that he pleaseth: it therefore followeth, that we must referre, not to the creatures or to nature, the workes, which hee hath done in them, and by them, but to him alone, and must attribute to him the total glory thereof, and to depend wholly vpon him and vpon his prouidence. Now if wee shall consider all creatures in their originall and ende ordained by God, we shall finde that they are all good, and ordained by the creator for the benefit of the good. And yet it might seeme that he hath established some things, principally to take vengeance on the wicked, as by this text of scripture, where the Lord saith to Job; [Hast thou entred into the treasures of the snowe? or hast thou seene the treasures of the haile, which I haue hid against the time of trouble, against the day of warre and battell?] In which text is deliuered vnto vs a goodly doctrine of the forme, and of the place, wherethe snow and haile are engendred, to wit, in the chambers builded by God among the waters, which hee gardeth as treasures, and congealeth them to serue him for scourges, to chastice and punish the froward. For it is hee (as the Psalmist chaunteb) who giueth snowe like wooll, and scattereth the boare frosts like ashes. He cast. Psalm. 147. eth soorth his Ice like morsels: who can abideth the cold thereof? He sendeth his word and melteth them: he causeth his winde to blowe, and the waters flow. This is he also (as saith Ecclesiasticus) which hasteneth the snow by his commandement, and strengtheneth the cloudes with great force to make the haile stones cracke. The south winde bloweth according to his will: the storme of the north, & the whirlewind flying out like birds, scatter the snowe, and the falling downe thereof is as an heape of grasshoppers or locusts that light downe in any country. The eie hath the whitnesse thereof in admiration, and the heart is astonished at the fall of it. The Lord powreth out the frost vpon the earth like salt, which when it is frozen sticketh on the tops of pales. The cold north winde bloweth, and the water is frozen: it abideth vpon the gatherings together of the water, and clotheth the water as with a breast plate. It deuoureth the mountaines, and burneth the wildeernes, and destroyeth that that is greene, like fire. The present remedie against all this, is a cloude, and the dew comming before the heate, appeaseth it. It is also written in the booke of Iob, Iob. 37. [The whirle winde commeth out of the heape of cloudes, and the colde from the north winde, at the breath God the frost is giuen, and the bredth of the waters is made narrow.] Iob 38. And therefore the Lord saith to Iob, Out of whose wombe came the ice? who hath engendred the frost of the heauen: The waters are hid as with a stone: and the face of the deepe is covered. Which is as much to say, as the waters take to them the forme of a stone, when they are conuerted into haile and ice, and that the sea is frozen ouer: for when the water is frozen, it seemeth to be hid and lost, and to be no more water.

Surely in these discourses we haue much to consider concerning the wonders of God. For is it not an admirable thing, that the water, which is soft, and runs so swiftly, should become as hard as stones, and that it can fall from heauen in such forme, yea sometimes so great that it doth not onely spoile the fruites of the earth, but doth also breake the branches of trees, and kill men and beasts. Hereof that is a certaine testimonie which we reade concerning the haile, which God sent vpon the Egyptians, by the ministerie of Moses, and Exod. 9. vpon the Amorites in the time of Ioshuah, in the warre of the Gibeonites. Indeepe this was Ioshu. 10. done contrarie to the course of nature, in respect of the Egyptians especially. For their land is not moistened, nor warred with raine from heauen, but onely by the riuer Nilus. And Deut. 11. therefore the power of God was evidently shewed, when hee caused so great haile to fall downe vpon the enemies of his people, that no man could iudge it to be naturall. For haile is made of raine frozen in the aire: and is different from snow and mists, in that the haile is engendred of raine more hard frozen: snowe of moisture more softly thicked: and mists and fogs of cold dewes. So that when the congealed water is frozen by a strong colde, it becommeth haile: if a small cold, it engendreth small drifling haile, such as falls commonly in the spring time, as in March and Aprill. But this me thinketh is worthis of greatest wonder, that the water in sommer time should bee congealed into haile; and that during the great heate of the sunne, the greatest congelation should bee made, from whence cometh this word amongst the Latines (Grando) which is as much to say, as a great drop of water: which is not seene in winter, when euery thing, through the exceeding colde, freezeth heere on earth: or if so bee this happen in such a time, it is spoken of as a newe and strange thing that comes not ordinarily in this season, like the snowe and mists, which are proper to winter and colde weather. For though the Naturalists trauell much to shew that all thinges are produced by inferior and naturall causes; yet must we principally acknowledge a diuine puissance aboue all, who hath causes hidden in his incomprehensible treasures from men, by which the haile, thunder, lightning, tempests and stormes Exod. 16. are disposed and dispersed according to his good pleasure. For as God made knowne to his people by the Manna which he sent them in the wildeernes, wherewith he nourished them for the space of fortie yeares in a barren and vnhabitable place, that hee could euermore very easily finde meanes enough, both ordinary and extraordinary, to nourish and maintaine them: so hath he made manifest by the rods and scourges wherewith hee hath beaten the Egyptians, that he can euermore very easily inuent meanes enow to punish his enemies, so often and whensoever he pleaseth, yea euen then, when there shall be no appearance thereof amongst men.

Now as God, when he pleaseth, conuerteth the water into stones, and so hardneth it that by great cold he doth (as it were) paue, not onely riuers, ponds, and lakes, but also great seas;

seas; which he maketh so firme, that one may passe over them, yea and draw ouer great and heauy chariots, as it were ouer bridges, and firme land: so when it pleaseth him, he causeth all this water so hardned to returne into the proper kinde thereof, as if it had neuer benee frozen. And as there be windes to congeale it, so there are windes to dissolue and thawe it. For we must note, that yce doth not dissolue and thaw by the heate of the sunne onely, but also by the power of the windes ordained hereto, yea and much sooner so, then otherwise. Concerning all which things, and the causes of them, which God hath created and established in nature, we shall heere make a brieft and generall discourse. For if we should speake as the Philosophers haue written and disputed, we should haue matter enough to compose a great volume. But we will content our selues simply to propound heere the admirable workes of God, by which euery one may learne to feare, and honour him: which is the only, and the greatest profit that we must make of meteors, whereof our speach hath hitherto benee, and which do yet rest for vs to consider of. For our intent is to manifest in them, not onely the workes of the creation, which are therein proposed, but those also of the diuine providence, which are in the same after diuers sorts declared: and not to do as many, who are esteemed very learned in naturall Philosophie, and in all other letters and humane sciences, who are so badly aduanced in the knowledge of God by them, that instead of acknowledging and glorifying him as it behooueth them, they rather become Atheists and Epicures, contemners and mockers of his Maiestie, and of all religion. But the iudgements of God shall therefore light very grievous vpon them, because they shall be by so much the more inexcusable. For they are of the number of those of whom Saint Paul saith that by their infidelitie, and iniustice, they detain the truth in iniustice, because they vniustly and wilfully suppress the knowledge of the Eternall: for hauing knowne him in the workes of the creation of the world, which are as a mirrour and shew of inuisible things, they glorifie him not as God, neither are thankfull: but become vaine in their imaginatons, and their foolish heart is full of darkenes, and when they professe themselves wise, they become fooles; because it hath pleased God so to punish their proud presumption, and the vanitie of there vnderstanding. Wherefore likewise as the Apostle saith in an other place: They haue their cogitations darkened, and are strangers from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, because of the hardnesse of their hearts. For by reason that they abuse the gift of knowledge, which they haue in a more ample measure then others, therefore doth the Omnipotent by his iust iudgement make them more blinde then the simple and ignorant, so that they are rather worthy to be accounted as beasts then as men. And yet the science and knowledge which they haue of the workes of God more abundant then others, is not cause of their blindnesse, considering that it is an excellent gift from above, profitable for all those, which can and will well vse it: but their malice, ingratitude, and peruersenesse of heart and vnderstanding pulleth this euill vpon them, through their owne fault, and by the iust vengeance of God. So that whereas their skill should open their eyes to guide them by the knowlege of the creatures, to that of the Creator, it is rather an hinderance vnto them, and deprieth them of that great and Soueraigne good. But we shall haue worthy arguments against their impietie in that which remaineth for vs to view, concerning other things engendred in the highest elements, amongst which many comprehend Comets, saying that they are of the number of sublime or high impressions, which are made in the region of the fire and aire. Wherefore pursuing our purpose wee will heare you (A M A N A) discourse vpon this subject.

Of comets. Chap. 46.

A M A N A. ALthough we haue hitherto spoken of sondry sorts of the creatures & workes of God, by which he manifesteth and declareth his power, glory, maiestie, and eternall providence, and chiefly in the region of the aire, neuertheless there doe yet a great number remaine, which wee haue nothing at all touched either particularly or in generall, no not so much as cursorily. For there are so many sorts of fires of diuers formes that appeare in the skie above, that it is impossible to distinguishe them all particularly. And amongst them there are some which sometimes seeme to fall from heaven or as if the stars did snuffe themselves, as men snuffe a candle: so that the most part of rude and ignorant rant people suppose it is so. Many others thinke that sometimes the starres sparkle. But the cause of such appearance is, for that the substance of heauen being very cleere, their beames shining towards vs, are euermore broken perpendicularly. For the aire beeing mooued, even as wee see the stones in the bottome of a riuer seeme to tremble, because of the running motion of the water; so doth the starres seeme to sparkle: and when the middle of the aire is vehemently stirred aboue, then they seeme to sparkle both more and oftner. But we wil leave this talke to speake of certaine heauenly fires, which we call comets, and which are worthy of great consideration, and of much maruell. For they appeare like bearded and hairy starres, hauing their motion with the heauen as if they were very starres: and certes we might wel suppose them such, and placed in heauen like therest, if they should long time continue. But the opinion of many is, (as Aristotle likewise writeth in his Meteors) that they are naturally made of an hotte exhalation, which attaineth to the supreamer region of the aire, where it is enflamed by the element of fire: so that of such an exhalation are fires kindled in heauen of diuers sorts and fashions. Neuerthelesse some learned moderne writers haue diligently obserued the height, whether these vapours may mount, doe thinke cleane otherwise: for they affirme that comets cannot be engendred in the region of the elements and are not affraide to giue sentence to Aristotle, who in truth being an Ethnike and Pagan, hath failed in the resolution of many particular questions. For hee hath strained himselfe to affirme many generall propositions, which our experience sheweth to bee vtterly false: as these. (That no living thing apprehendeth by sense that which is good; that a thing poized can incline neither to the one side nor to the other; & that the earth is in no part higher then the waters, and sundry others.) Now it hath bin permitted him to abandon the opinion of his master Plato, who taught the truth, yea and to reprehend him: it shall bee also lawfull for vs, and very laudable to separate our selues in opinion from him, & to contradict his writings for the truth.

They then that doe not acknowledge comets to bee conioyned vnto, and depending vpon the effects of the elementary fire, and aire, by meanes of exhalations and vapours arising from the earth, do alleadge among other reasons, that the place which is seene by the inhabitants of Milan vnder the circle of winter or the Tropicke of Capricorne, is distant from the earth tenne times more then the height that the vapours attaine to. And therefore the comets beeing seene there higher then the place of the vapours, it necessarily followeth, that they are not there engendred, neyther yet in the highest of the pure aire called (Aether) considering that there is no matter, which may bee kindled. But if any one alleadge that the combustible humour is rauished and attracted thither by the power of the starres though that this place be higher then the common place of vapours; wee may answere, that for as much as we behold many comets to continue more then two moneths, and some three, that this their long continuance may be an impediment thereto: because that the totall masse of the earth would not be sufficiēt for such an inflammation. Moreouer there is a means to know, whether the comet be in the region of the aire, or else be engendred in heauen. For if it be quicker in motion from West to East, then the Moone is; then of necessitie must the place of the comet be vnder the lowest sphere: but if it bee more slow, then without doubt it is bread in heauen. Now it is common to all comets to be mooued with three motions: namely, with the first from East to West in the space of foure and twentie houres, like all the Starres: with the second from West to East, almost in like space of time with the planet Venus. For a Comet which appeared the two and twentieth day of September 1532. and ended the third day of December, proceeded (as Fracastrinus writeth) in 71. one daies from the first part of Virgo, to the eight part of Scorpio. Which maketh manifest that it could not be vnder the Moone: for then it should haue been more swiftly mooued then this planet: which retrogradeth thirteenth parts of the Zodiacke in foure and twenty houres, according to the ordinarie course of the first motion: and the comet had proceeded but 63. degrees in 71. daies. But for the third motion peculiar to all comets, which is considered according to the latitude, it is such and so great, that if the foresaid Author be not deceiued, one is now mooued with incredible speede towards the North, and another in an instant towards the South. Which cometh to passe when the comets are neere to any of the Poles, for then a little varietie of place conferred to the zodiacke doth greatly change the latitude. Besides, it is to bee noted that the beard of euery comet doth directly stretch out that way, which is opposite to the Sunne: and when it setteth, the same taile is straight Eastward: As the like may bee dayly seene in the darke part of the

Moone. Moreover the comet doth most vsually accompany the Sunne and appeareth not but at euentide, and at the shutting vp of the day. Which giueth vs to vnderstand, that a comet is a globe placed in heauen, which being enlightened by the Sunne doth plainly appeare: and when his rayes passe farther, they shew like the fashion of a beard, or of a tayle. Whereupon it appeareth that this flaming globe may be made in the midst of the spheres, if the generation thereof be in them: or else we must say (and that seemeth true) that the heauen is full of many starres, not very massie, which (the aire being dry and attenuated) doe present themselves to our sight. For Venus her selfe is sometimes seene in broad day, which none can say to be newly engendred. Then through this drines of the aire it commonly happeneth, that the seas are much turmoiled with tempests, and that great blustering windes doe follow thereupon, and that Monarches and great Princes, who are most dry through cold and watchings, or else through abundance of hot and delicate meates and of strong wine, doe thereupon die: So likewise the dry and attenuated aire causeth the waters to diminish, fishes to die, and scarcity of victuals, which oftentimes stirreth vp seditions, and the change of lawes, and finally the subuersion of states. All which things (I say) doe seeme in some sort to proceed through the great tenuity and drines of the aire: and therof the comet then appearing may be a signe and token, but not the cause. But if we will meditate vpon these things like christians, wee will say, that what naturall causes soeuer Naturalists and Astrologers can render concerning comets, signes and wonders which appeare sometimes in heauen, [that they should be so often vnto vs, like so many trumpets, heraulds, & fore-runners of the Iustice of God, to aduertise men that they remaine not buried in their filth and sins, but to returne to the infinit goodnes of God, who reacheth out his hand, & calleth to vs through such signes to change our life and leaue our execrable vices, to the ende that through his mercy, we may obtaine pardon for our faults.

But let vs likewise note, that although sundry sorts of comets are seene, yet the greekes call them properly starres that haue a sanguine bush of haire, and are bristled at the toppe. And those which haue vnder them a long beard made like haire, they call (Pogonies). Pliny reporteth of sundry other sorts: and saith, that the shortest time that euer comet was seene to appeare, hath bene seuen daies, and the longest time eighty. Hee maketh mention also of one, which seemed terrible about the clime of Egypt and Ethiopia. For it was flaming and wreathed round like a serpent, hauing a very hideous and dreadfull aspect: so that one would haue said, that it had rather bene a knotte of fire, then a starre. Afterward this author concludeth his speech, with the opinion that many haue (as is aboue said) that comets are perpetuall, and that they haue a proper and peculiar motion: saying also, that none can see them, except they be very farre distant from the sunne, in such sort that they may not be couered with his beames. And yet the opinion of Aristotle is cleane contrary thereto, and so are a great number of other Philosophers, who affirme that comets are composed of a certaine fire, and of an humour which it lighteth one by chance, for which cause, they are subiect to resolution. But we will proceed no farther in this argument, nor yet concerning the situation of them, whether they be vnder the spheres, or amongst them: but will pursue our purpose concerning things vndoubtedly engendred in the highest elements, as namely, the Cloudes. The discourse whereof (ARAM) I referre to you.

Of Cloudes and Vapours. Chap. 47.

Psal. 19.
How cloudes are made of vapours.

ARAM. AS the Lord and Father of this great Vniuers doth publish his glory by the motions of the heauens, and the marvellous courses of all the lights in them, so doth he likewise in the aire after many sorts, as we haue already heard, and as we haue yet good proofes in that which is presented vnto vs for the matter of our discourse. And therefore the kingly Prophet saith, that the heauens report the glory of God, and the firmament doth declare his workes. For the Hebrew word, which we call firmament, doth properly signifie (a spreading abroad) and comprehendeth both the heauen and the aire. Now let vs first note, that there is nothing more weaker then the aire, nor any element that can worse sustaine a charge, if it haue no other prop. Then let vs consider of what matter the cloudes are made, and what firmenesse they may retaine. It is certain that

that they are nothing els but vapors attracted out of the waters by the power of the sun, as we behold after a great raine, when the heate of the sunne striketh vpon the earth. For we perceiue the water to ascend vpwads like a great smoke: and we see an other cleere experience hereof in wet clothes and linnen, when they receive the heat of heauen, or of the fire. So it is then, that the water ceaseth not to mount from earth vp into the aire, and then to descend downe againe, so the course thereof is perpetuall, as if there were a sea mounting from earth to heauen, which we call (Aire,) then descending from thence down hither to vs. For after that of vapors, which ascend from the earth, the clouds are gathered together, which like sponges doe receive the steame of the waters, whereof they themselues are engendered; then doe they carry them like chariots, to distribute them through all the quarters of the world, according as is ordained by the providence of God. And therefore Elihu saith in the booke of Iob, (Behold God is excellent, and we know it not neither can the number of his yeeres be searched out, when he restraineth the droppes of water, the raine powreth downe by the vapor thereof, which raine the clouds doe drop and let fall abundantly vpon man. Then proceeding to shew, how God spreadeth out the light of the sunne vpon the waters of the sea, to draw out and produce vapors, he addeth: [Who can know the diuisions (that is varieties and diuersities) of the clouds, and the thunders of his tabernacle: Behold he spreads his light vpon it, & couereth the roots of the sea.] Meaning by roots the waters of the sea, as well because they are deep, as for that they are diu-ded by diuers waues like the branches of rootes. Moreouer, we must consider that to carry and conuey the cloudes hither and thither, God hath created the winds, which blow from all the quarters of the world: some to gather the clouds together, and to bring raine & snow or haile and tempests, by means of the same cloudes, according as pleaseth the Creator to dispose them: other winds on the contrary do disperse them and make the aire cleere and pleasant, bringing faire weather. Hereof then it cometh, that aboue in the aire, betweene heauen and earth, there is, as it were an other heauen made of cloudes spread out like a cortaine, or like a vault of couering ouer our heads, which hindereth vs of sight of the sun, Moone, and Starres. But as the masse of cloudes is made by meanes of windes ordained thereto, so when it pleaseth God to giue vs faire weather, then doth hee send vs other winds, which chase away all these cloudes, and cleere the aire, as if they had been swept away, and the heauen sheweth another countenance to the world, as if it had bin changed and renewed.

Property of the windes in regard of the cloudes.

Now while the aire is filled with cloudes, this may very well bee considered by vs, that men haue then (as it were) a great sea of water ouer their heads, containd and held with in those cloudes, as the waters of the sea are within the bounds which are assigned them for their course. Which seemeth that Moses taught, when hee sheweth that God creating all things separated the waters, which are vpon the earth, from those which are in the aire, saying thus: That there was a stretching out between the waters, and that it separated the waters from the waters. God then made the firmament (or spreading abroad or stretching out) and separated the waters, which are vnder the firmament from those which were aboue it, and it was so. And God called the firmament, Heauen.] It is sure that by these words, many haue thought that the Prophet would teach, that there were waters, both vnder and aboue heauen: which seemeth to be confirmed by the Psalmist, saying [Praise ye the Lord heauens of heauens, & waters that be aboue the heauens, praise his name.] Neuer-thelesse it is not very easie for vs to vnderstand, what waters may be aboue the heauens, if we doe not take the name of heauen in these two texts, for the aire, as wee haue heretofore shewed, that it is oftentimes so taken. For what shall wee answer being demanded to what vse the materiall waters may serue, either among the spheres, or aboue the planets and stars?
 And for to take the name of waters here, for spirituall waters, not corporall, as many haue argued: me seemeth, (vnder correction of the wiser) which we preferre in all our discourses, that this cannot fitly be affirmed; because it doth evidently appeare that Moses speaketh of materiall waters. For he accomodating himselfe to a grosse people, among whom he conuersed, maketh no mention in all the creation of the world, but of the creating of visible and corporall things; That there is small likelihood that hee should speake of other waters, mixing spirituall things with corporall. But because the Latine translator of the common version of the Bible hath vsed, it in this text, the word firmament, following the translation of the Greekes, and not the proper word (spreading abroad) as the Hebrew phrase doth signifie; some of the learned haue obserued, how that many Latine Diuines haue

have bene hindered from the vnderstanding of this doctrine. For they have taken the name Firmament, for the starry heaven (as also the Greekes haue iudged) imitating their translation. Whereupon the imagination is sprung of waters about the heavens, and of a chrySTALLINE heaven: which I suppose to have bene so called, by reason of these waters, which were supposed to be about the firmament; because that chrySTALL is made of ice, and ice of water. For it had bene very difficult to conceive how materiall waters, which by nature are corruptible, might be about the celestiall spheres, except they were hardened and conuerted into chrystal, because that from the moone vpwards, there are no creatures subiect to corruption and to such changes, as those that are vnder the moone. Behold then, why these men haue supposed such waters to have bene made partakers of the nature of heaven. But what neede is there to trauell in such disputations, and to take paines for to haue recourse to allegories, when one may be easily satisfied with the literall sense? For there is nothing more easie, then to make the words of Moses cleere and euident, beeing thoroughly considered. For first hee hath declared, how that the earth was couered all ouer with water, and that there was a great deepe overwhelmed with darknes, so that the earth did in no wise appeare, til such time as God had commanded the waters to retire themselves into their places, which he hath assigned for their perpetuall residence. And then the earth was discovered, even so much thereof as was needfull for the habitation and nourishment of men, and of all the creatures, which God did afterwards create. Therefore David (as the expounder of Moses words, saith) That the Lord hath set the earth vpon her foundations: adding straight after, That he had couered it with the deepe, at with a garment, and that the waters did stand about the mountaines; but as his rebuke they fled: which is as much to say, as when God hath commaunded the waters to retire and to discover the earth, they suddenly obeyed the voice of their creatour. Now Moses having spoken of those waters which are resident here below on earth, gathered as well into the sea, as into fountaines and rivers, he afterwards declareth, how God would assigne vnto them another abode in a certain region of the aire, which hee first calleth a spreading abroad, and after that heaven, which the Psalmist also signifieth when he saith of God, that hee couereth himselfe with light as with a garment, and spreadeth the heavens like a curtaine, which is to say: that the light is to the creator like a stately garment, wherein we behold his glory to shine and glister euery where, and that he hath spread abroad the heavens like a pavilion for his habitation. Moreover, he addeth, [The Lord doth lay the ioules of his high chambers among the waters: he maketh the great clouds his chariot. He holdeth backe (saith Iob) the face of his throne & stretcheth out his cloud vpon it.] And therefore the Scripture doth also teach vs, that God hath oftentimes declared his presence, and manifested his glory both to Moses, and to all the people of Israel by the cloudes. And when Iesus Christ ascended into heaven a cloud taking him, bare him vp in the sight of his Apostles, to declare vnto them, and make them sure of the place whether he went, vsing this cloud as a triumphat chariot, which hath giuen testimony of his soueraigne and eternall maiestie. And therefore it is also written, that he shall come in the cloudes of heaven with power and glorie. Wherefore if we were well instructed in the sacred word of God we should haue a very cleare doctrine concerning Meteors, and which were much more profitable then that which Philosophers teach. For the cloudes would excellently declare vnto vs the magnificence and maiestie of God, so often as wee should behold them, and would represent vnto vs all the wonders by vs here mentioned: as wee shall also bee induced to admire them, considering more neerely the great miracle of the waters sustained and hanged in the aire, as pursuing our purpose I leave to you (ACHITO) to discover.

Of the waters sustained and hanged in the aire, and of the Raine-bowe. Chap. 48.

ACHITO. I Will beginne my speach with the saying of the kingly Prophet, who after that he had appointed the heavens for the pavilion of God, and ordeined the cloudes for the planchers thereof, whereupon are raised the loftie chambers (that is to say, the great and spacious waters amassed vp within the cloudes, which hee also proposeth vnto vs as the chariot, vpon which the Eternall is borne) being consequently willing

willing to shew what the horses are, by which the chariot is drawne and driven, he saith, [He walketh vpon the wings of the wind. He maketh the spirits his messengers, and flaming fire his ministers:] which is as much, as if in some he would declare, that men need not labour to mount aloft into heauen there to contemplate and behold God, sith that he so cleerely manifesteth himselfe throughout the whole world, principally by the celestiall creatures, and then by the magnificent and marvellous workes, which he daily performeth heerein the aire neere vnto vs, and before our eyes. So surely, if wee must account as great miracles, the coming of the Sunne vnto vs and his returne, which daily continueth, and the courses and motions of all the other celestiall bodies, wee haue no lesse occasion to account as a thing miraculous and and worthie of great wonder, that we so often behold here below, a great cell of waters ouer our heads in the aire, sustained by the water it selfe, & by vapours like to smoke, as if they were hanged in the aire, and were there borne vp without any stay and prop, but by the inuisible vertue and power of God, For otherwise, how could the cloudes sustaine so great heapes, and such deepe gulfes of water, considering that they are nothing else but water, and do also come at lenght to resoluue into water? Againe how without this diuine power could these cloudes be supported in the aire, seeing that the aire it selfe seemeth to consist of waters most subtilly distilled, being very light, and in continuall motion. For it evidently appeareth, that the aire retaineth much of the nature of water, because that so ordinarily it conuerteth therein, being inclosed in a cold and moist place: so that many fountaines are by this meanes engendred of aire, if we will credit Naturalists. And therefore as David saith of the waters, which runne about the earth, that God hath appointed a bound vnto them, which they may not passe, nor returne any more to souerflow the habitation of men: so may we likewise say, that he hath bounded the waters that hang in the aire, within the cloudes, to the end that they may not runne loosely a-frey. And therefore Iob saith: (He bindeth the waters in the cloudes, and the cloud is not broken vnder them.) For else it is most certaine that so often as these waters should fall vp on the earth, they would drowne vp all things whereupon they powred, like as when the sea and riuers ouerflow the banks, or like a great deluge, as come to passe, when God punished the world by waters, in the time of Noah. For it is written, that not onely all the fountaines of the great deep were broken vp, but that the windowes of heauen were opened, and that raine fell vpon the earth forty daies and forty nights. For which cause also the Psalmist singeth [The voice of the Lord is vpon the waters, the glory of God maketh it to thunder; the Lord is vpon the great waters. He was set vpon the flood, and he shall remaine king for euer:] which is as much to say, as the Lord hath executed his iudgement vpon the wicked, by the waters of the flood, and that as then hee tooke vengeance, so it is he, that doth for euer remaine iudge of the world, & that maketh all creatures to tremble before him. Where wee haue great matter of feare and trembling, if wee beleue the word of God, and the testimonies which it deliuereth of his iudgements, when I say, wee diligently consider the effects of the nature of the higher elements. Therefore whensoever wee see close weather, and the aire filled with cloudes, threatning vs with raine and tempests, the sight thereof should alwaies refresh and renew in vs the memory of this iudgement of God, so terrible and vniuersal in the flood, to teach vs to walke in more feare of his Maiestie. But there are few, which think thereupon, and can make their profit thereof: and many to the contrary, doe but iest and scoffe at it, as if it were a fable, and a fantasie.

I know very well, that the Scripture saith, that God set the Raine-bow in the cloudes for signe of an accord and attonement betweene him and men, and every liuing creature, to the end that the water might neuer after increase to such a flood as should roote out all flesh. But we must note, that the Eternalldoth not here promise, neuer to send any deluge vpon the earth, but onely not a generall and vniuersall flood, as the first was in the time of Noah. For how many times hath he punished particularly many people with great inundations and deluges of water: signifying vnto all, that he hath all his creatures at commandement for euer to make them serue, either to his wrath or to his mercy, according as he will intreat men? and hereupon wee shall learne, that though it seemeth, that in the place before alledged, the Raine bow is named, as if it had beene spred in the aire at that time onely, when it was giuen by GOD as a signe and Sacrament of his couenant renewed: yet neuertheless wee must not doubt, but that when GOD created the causes of this Bowe in nature ordayned by him, hee did also create it in the establishing of the world with other creatures. But it was not vsed by God for a testimonie of his attonement with mankinde, till after the flood. So likewise it is certain, that this heavenly bow hath naturally had at all times the significations which at this present it retaineth, to presage raine or faire weather, according as it diuersly appeareth. But since that the creator hath accepted it for a signe of his covenant, it hath had this vantage, to be ordained as a gage and witness of the promises of God. And therefore whensoever we behold it in heaven, we must not onely consider of it, as of a naturall thing, and as a prognosticator sometimes of raine, sometimes of faire weather: but likewise as a witness and memoriall as well of the iudgement of God, as of his grace and mercy, and of the assurance of the conseruation of all creatures by his providence. But though it should teach vs nothing of al this, but should onely retaine the beauty and naturall signification thereof, yet might it serue as for an excellent testimony of the maiesty of God, and incite vs to giue him praise. For which cause Ecclesiasticus saith. (Looke vpon the rainebow and praise him that made it: very beautifull it is in the brightnes therof. It compasseth the heauen about with a glorious circle, & the hands of the most high haue bended it.) For what man is so dull, but doth admire the great variety of so faire colours as appeare in it, even in a substance so fine and subtile, that it cannot be perceived by any corporall sense, saue by the sight.

I know that the philosophers doe teach, that as a droppe of water, which one seeth in the sunne, representeth many goodly colours like those in the rainebowe, which is made of a thicke watery cloud full of droppes, in the middle region of the aire. For every darke obscure thing is, as it were, almost blacke, as the shadowes doe demonstrate, which by reason of their obscurity seeme to be blacke. And when an obscure thing is illuminated, if it be bright, it passeth in colours, according to the abundance of the brightnes. Now the cloud is obscure, and the drops of water are bright, and for this cause they represent vnto vs colours according to the variety of that light which shineth vpon them. And forasmuch as the innermost circle of the bow is neere to the obscure or dark cloud, it seemeth commonly to be blew, that to the middle, which is more illuminate, appeareth greene, and the vpper circle, which is greatest, and most lighted with celestially brightnes, is yellow. Forasmuch then as there is a cause of euery thing, the Naturalists do much endeavour themselves to render reasons, concerning the diuersities of these colours: as Astrologians doe also, to argue vpon the diuers predictions of this bowe, as presaging sometimes raine, sometimes faire weather, sometimes winde, and sometimes calme and cleere weather. Yet Pliny saith; that it is often seene, when it doth not prognosticate any thing, and that no heede is taken of it, for the time to come. But let every one ascertaine himselfe, that it is caused by the beames of the sunne, which striking into an hollow cloud, are constrained to reuerberate, and returne vpwards towards the sunne. And that the diuersity of colours, which are therein represented, is made by the mixture of the clouds, of the aire, and of the fire, which are found there together. Moreover; that this bow neuer is, but when the sunne is opposit to that cloud & that it exceeds not the forme of a semicircle: also that it appeareth not by night, though Aristotle saith that it hath sometimes been then seene. But we will leaue the philosophers to dispute vpon these things, and to search the depth of their naturall causes; and will conclude this speech, and make an end of this day with a point of doctrine, concerning the meteors of Christians: which is, that wee must take very good heed, not to be of the number of those, who boasting of the knowledge of humane sciences, haue despised the spirituall and diuine: and of whom Saint Peter hath prophesied saying, That there should come in the last daies mockers and contempters of God, walking according to their owne lusts, which should say, [Where is the promise of his comming? For since the fathers died, all things continue alike from the creation.] Which is as much as they should say, that there is a common and continuall course of nature, which hath hitherto continued from the beginning of the world, and shall endure for ever, without end, and without any iudgement of God to come. For thus prate our idolaters of nature, who do altogether denie the providence of God. And therefore the blessed apostle doe also adde, that they willingly knowe not that the heauens were of old, and that earth, that was of the water, and the water by the word of God. By which things the world that was, perished, being overflowed with waters. Likewise saint Peter had before concluded; that if God had not spared the olde world, but saved Noah the eight person, a preacher of righteousness, and brought in the flood vpon the troupe of the vngodly: it cannot be that the wicked, which are borne since into the world, may thinke that their condemnation sloweth, and that their perdition sleepeeth. For a thousand yeres are but as one day, & one day is as a thousand yeres before the

the Lord. And the long terme that God alloweth to men, to preuent his iudgement by repentance and amendment, shall not hinder him to execute his iudgement, yea by so much the more rigorously, by how much the more long time, and more viely they haue abused his stay and patience. Let vs then imprint this at this present in our memorie, concerning our discourse of the waters sustained and hanged in the aire, which haue serued God for so terrible ministers in the execution of his iustice, when it pleased him to punish the iniquitie of men: and to morrow, pursuing our subiect, wee will speake againe of raines, and heavenly waters, to the end to consider of the admirable providence of God, which shineth in them: euen as you (ASER) shall giue vs to vnderstand.]

The end of the sixth day.

Of Dewes and Raines. Chap. 49.

ASER.

He providence of God hath so disposed the nature of the aire and of the water, that these elements seeme to repaire and maintaine one another. For there is a place in the aire where water is, as it were, converted into the nature thereof: there is another place againe, wherein water returneth into his owne naturall kinde, saving that whilest it hangeth and is sustained in the aire, it is much more light and subtile then that which runneth in the earth, for it retaineth more of the earth. Although then that water is by nature more heauy then the aire; yet doth not the heauinesse thereof let it from mounting vp from the earth, because that by the the heat of the Sunne which attracteth it, and other such like naturall causes, by which it may be eleuated into the aire, this waightinesse is taken from it, or at least is so diminished, that it doth then retaine more of the nature of aire, then of water, and so doth till such time as it hath ascended, and attained to the place which God hath assigned to it in the aire. For the heat of the sunne doth conuert it first into vapors, which are drawne out of the least terrestriall and most subtile parts thereof, which approach neere to the nature of the aire. For which cause these vapors are more easily converted into aire, the which resolue it selfe againe into water, then when such vapors are arrived at the middle region of the aire, which is the coldest part thereof, as well by reason that it is farther distant from the sunne and from all the other celestiaall and atherian fires, then the supreme part thereof is; as likewise because it cannot be heated like the lowest part thereof, by reuerberation of the sunnes heate, which scorseth the earth. Wherefore Moses declaring vnto vs, how the Lord made the water mount from the earth, and converted it into vapors, saith: [The Lord God had not caused it to raine vpon the earth, neither was there a man to till the ground, but a mist (or vapor) went vp from the earth, and watered all the earth.] For we behold every day, how that after the aire hath beene refreshed by the choolenes of the night, the dew falleth in the morning vpon the earth: and if the colde hath beene great, it is turned into mist, and white hoarie frost, from which proceede the frosts that doe often times spoile vines and trees, which are most tender in colde weather, when their branches, are yet feeble, and they beginne to budde.

How the water ascendeth vp from the earth and changeth nature.

And let vs note, that there are two sorts of vapors, which do commonly rise from the terrestriall towards the celestiaall region: the one is fat and thicke, wherof the dew is made: and the other is subtile and thinne, which turneth into raine. Corne fields are fatned by the dew, which by reason of the thickenes thereof mounteth not very high: and if that any part of it be better concocted (as doth happen ordinarily in hot countries) it resteth condensate through colde vpon the plants, and is called Manna. Of this it is that Pliny speaketh, when he saith, that the great starres being risen in sommer, and specially the most excellent, or else when the raine bow is ouer the earth, and that it raine not, but only make a small dew, which

which is heated by the sun beames; that which then falleth is not home, but is an heavenly gift and singular medicine for the eies, for vicers, and for those accidents which may happen in the nauell and interior parts. Which Manna is plentifully gathered in Targa, a wilderness of Libya, neere to the citie Agades, especially when the nights are very faire, partly for that they are colder then the day; and partly for that the dewes cannot conuert themselves into the substance of clouds: because as I said it is condensate by the colde. Whereupon ensueth that when the raine is ingendred of vapors, the colde cannot bee great: for then such vapors are attracted by the heate, and are presently after thickened by the colde in the region of the aire. And therefore there is but little Manna found when the night is cloudie, and lesse when it is rainie, for then it melteth. Behold then how the fattest part of vapors turneth into dew, and that which mounteth vp, is condensate through colde in the subtilie aire, and is afterwards conuerted into raine. And because that in sommer the heate doth drie vp very neere so much as it attracteth in vapors, there is therefore very seldome little raine therein: for considering that in our countries the heate is weake, it attracteth by little and little the vapors, which the driness doth oftentimes consume before they can be conuerted into raine. Wherefore it commeth to passe, that if it raine in summer, the raine is suddenly engendred: for when the cloudes are too slow, they are consumed by the driness of the sunne. And there where the aire is very colde, and consequently thicke and grosse, the vapor, which is thither drawne, being very light, cannot be condensate, because of the thickenesse of the aire and the thinnesse of the vapor. Which causeth, that in stead of raine, snow is engendred: for snow is a congelation of a vapor not condensate for the subtilie of his proper substance, and for because of the thickenesse of the aire. Wherefore when the cold is great in winter, it raineth little. And for the spring time, because that the succeeding day doth consume more vapor, then the precedent day had attracted (for in the spring time the latter daies are still hotter, and haue shorter nights) for this cause it raineth then lesse then in autumn, and oftner then in sommer or winter. But in Autumn showres of raine are commonly great, and of long continuance: For the sunne being as then still powerfull vpon the earth, many vapors are drawn vp. But because the succeeding day hath still a longer night then the precedent, and for that it was also warmer it is necessarie that the vapor should thicken, and afterwarde descend. And when the earth is moistned, then that which did descend, is againe attracted, lying then not onely raine, the earth, and being still somewhat deeper then before. Whereof are made vpon the superficies of but also rainie and windie cloudes.

Thus haue we in summe then the forme of dewes and raine, and the diuersitie of course, and how the earthly and heavenly waters differ from one another, the raine water retaining more of the aire, and being much purer and lighter, then that which doth alwaies remaine in the earth. For in comparison of terrestriall water it is like water distilled through a Limbeck. And yet how light soeuer it be, it must neuertheless be heauier then the aire, and especially, when it is frozen within the cloudes, and conuerted into snow or haile, which is like stones of ice. Wherein it seemeth that this rule of nature and naturall Philosophie is not generally true, which affirmeth, That every heauie thing doth alwaies drawe downward, considering there are waters hanged in the aire, which is much lighter then the waters that it sustaineth. Wherefore wee must say, that cloudes are in the aire in the region that is assigned vnto them, in such sort as ships are in the water. For none doubteth, but that stones, iron, lead, and all other mettals, yea, infinite other things of lesse waight, are heavier then the water; yet we neuerthes doe behold, that there is no burthen so waightie, but the water doth easily support it, by meanes of a Boat, or a wooden Shippe, or a Galley, which shall be euen of it selfe a great and heavy load. And yet the water, which will sustaine such a charge, cannot beare vp a pinne, or a naile, or a small peece of gold, or silver, or a little stone, but all shall sink to the bottome. Now the cause of all these effects is the participation that the wood hath with the aire, which maketh it much lighter then the other bodies, which are more solide and massie. For by reason that the wood is more open, and more loose to giue way to the aire, it receiueth lightnesse thereof, which causeth it to float vpon the water, whereas the other more terrestriall bodies doe sink thereinto. So then the aire sustaineth by meanes of the cloudes, the waters which they containe inclosed within them: euen as the sea and great rivers sustaine grosse and heavy burdens, by meanes of Ships. For though the cloudes doe consist of water themselves, and are engendred of it, being drawne into the aire, through blowing of the windes, and afterwarde massed vp in

in one bodie (as we have already vnderstood) yet do they subsist of a water lesse terrestriall and more aerie, then those waters, which flow here below: for which cause they are also more light, and more easily sustained by the aire, vpon which they floate, like ships vpon the sea and other waters. And afterwarde when the cloudes returne into their first nature of water, and when they be opened to let fall the waters which they containe, the water which proceedeth from them doth resume also his proper course, according to the naturall heaviness thereof, and returneth downewards, descending to the earth. And as ships sinke downe into the water, when they are overchagred, as likewise the charges and burdens, wherewith they are ladden, when they are split or broken by violence of windes or by some other force which maketh them dash one against another, & against the rocks: so is it with the clouds, & with the things which they beare, and with the windes also wherewith they are driven, or else are inclosed with them, which make a great noise, when they strue to issue out, so that the cloudes are rent and cracke, as the thunders testifie vnto vs, and the tempests, lightnings, and thunderclaps which proceede from them, as also the great deluges of water, which shewre downe with great violence and furie. But we haue staied long enough in this matter: let vs now consider of the marvellous prouidence of God, which shineth in the dispensation of the raine and heavenly waters. As (A M A N A) I leaue to you to discourse,

Of the fertilitie caused by dewes and raine, and of the prouidence of God therein. Chapter 30.

A M A N A. I N vaine shall we consider in meteors the workes of nature, which are therein proposed very great and excellent, as our precedent speech doth manifest; if we doe not learne in the same to consider and acknowledge the prouidence of God governing all things, as it revealeth it selfe in sundry sorts. For all these goodly visible works must serue vs as images of the inuisible and spirituall things, so that all the creatures of God may be competent iudges to condemne vs, if by them wee doe not learne to acknowledge their and our creatour, and to obey and honour him as becometh vs: we neede no other iudges, I say, to make vs vnexcusable before the throne of Gods iustice, according to the testimonie of Saint Paul, sith he hath as it were, made visible to the eie his diuinitie, his power, his bountie and wisdom through his works, and that so neere vnto vs, as almost to be touched with our owne hands. For (as this holy apostle in another place saith) he is neere to euery one of vs: so that howsoeuer we be blind, yet should we at least finde him by groping like those that want sight. For hee neuer wanteth very euident witness amongst men, in conferring benefits vpon the, & namely in giuing them raine from heauen, and fruitfull seasons, according to the subiect we are now to speake of. Let vs know then, that it is he who distributeth the raine & heavenly waters by an admirable prouidence & who also keepeth them hidden when he pleaseth, in such sort, that there is no cloud seene in the aire, and sometimes for so long space, that the earth becommeth drie, and as it were burnt vp with the beames of the Sun, for want of moisture from heauen, as it was in the dayes of Elias. And then hee executed the sentence wherewith hee threatned the transgressors of his Law, when he denounced to them by Moses, that hee would make the heauen as brasle, and the earth as iron: that is to say, that there should come no more raine from heauen, then if it were of brasle: whereupon doth also follow, that the earth not being moistened with water from heauen, should become barren, bearing no more fruit, then if it were of Iron. For as it is written, [The earth, which drinketh in raine that cometh oft vpon it, and bringeth forth herbes meete for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing of God. But that which beareth thornes and briars is reprooued, and is neere vnto cursing, whose end is to be burned.] And therefore likewise the Prophet saith in the Psalmes, that God turneth the floods into deserts, and springs of water into drinnesse, and the fruitfull ground into saltnesse: which is asmuch as if he should say, that hee maketh it altogether barren, as if one had sowed salt there. Adding also afterwards, that it is for the wickednesse of those that dwelt therein, and that contrariwise hee turneth the deserts into pooles of water, and the drie land into water springs, making it an habitation for such as were famished, who there sowe the fields and plant vines, which bring forth yearly

And surely the holy spirit would giue vs to vnderstand this one thing more in this text, that as the earth waxeth barren, if it bee not watred by raine from heauen; so men cannot performe any thing, if God powre not downe his grace vpon them, as he caused the raine waters to shewre down vpon the earth. Wherefore as it is vnfruitful, not being watred from heauen: even so is mankind, when God withdraweth his blessing. For we are all cursed by nature, as the earth is, as wee euen now heard the Apostle giue euidence.

Psalm. 65.
Of the fertility caused by raine.

When therefore it pleaseth the creator, he commandeth the clouds to distribute their waters, to the end that the earth may be moistened and watred, to make it fertile. And therefore the kingly Prophet saith againe. [Thou visitest the earth and watrest it: thou makest it very rich; the river of God is full of water; thou preparest the corne, for so thou appointest it. Thou watrest abundantly the furrowes thereof; thou causest the raine to descend into the valleies thereof; thou makest it soft with showers, and bledest the bud thereof. Thou crownest the yeere with thy goodnesse, and thy steps drop fatnes.] Meaning by the steps or paths, and walkes of the Lord, the cloudes, for that the Scripture proposeth him vnto vs, walking vpon them: and by fatnesse hee vnderstandeth the raine which droppeth vpon the earth, as it doth also serue therefore. And in another Psalme he againe recordeth: [The Lord watreth the mountaines from his loftie chambers:] which is as much to say, as God causeth it to raine vpon the mountaines to make them fruitfull. And therefore hee further addeth, [That the earth is filled with the fruite of his workes.] Wherein the Prophet doth also expound his owne meaning, saying before, that the Almighty laide the planchers of his high chambers amongst the waters, and after that hee hath generally entreated of the fertilitie which God bestoweth vpon the earth, by meanes of the raine, hee doth declare it more particularly, saying [He causeth grasse to grow for the cattle, and herbe for the vse of man, that hee may bring forth bread out of the earth; and wine that maketh glade the heart of man; and oyle that maketh the face to shine, and bread that strengthneth mans heart. The high trees are satisfied, euen the Cedars of Libanon, which he hath planted: That the birds may make their nests there: the Storke dwelleth in the fir-trees.] Where we cleerely behold how God sendeth his blessing vpon the earth, by meanes of the raine, to the end that it may bring forth fruits, not onely for the nourishment of men; but also for the commoditie of beaſts. Which may serue vs for a certaine testimonie of his providence towards mankind. For if he hath care of the bruite beaſts which he hath created for men; there is no doubt, but he hath much more care of them whom hee hath created after his owne image and semblance, and aboue all, of his children and elect. And for this cause also the Psalmist signifieth, how that God hath not onely bene carefull to provide for their necessities, as for the necessities of other creatures; but it hath also pleased him to bestowe vpon them pleasures and honest comforts, conuenient both for his Maieſtie, as also for the nature of man: when he saith, that GOD hath given wine to man to make him merrie; and oyle to make his face shine. For although hee already had the waters for drinke, and which might suffice him to stanch his thirst, and for his necessarie beuerage, it hath neuerthelesse pleased him through his great liberalitie to bestow wine vpon him also, which is as much more delicious drinke, and which doth so comfort him, that it bringeth ioy and pleasure to him. And for oyle, it doth not onely serue in meats and medicinall ointments; but also to make compositions and sweete saouours, to beautifie and refresh mans countenance. Which specialities the prophet would not omit: because that in his dayes oyle was in great vse, to make such precious ointments, as the ancients vsed to annoint themselves withall, as is nowadaies done with oyle of Spike, and other such odouriferous oyles and sweete waters. And if God hath at some times multiplied by the hands of his faithfull ministers the poore widowes oyle (as his word teacheth vs) hee causeth it to abound much more every day, when he maketh it encrease in the lands which hee hath destinated to that purpose, converting the water, which runneth vpon the olive trees into oyle: yea and that water, which droppeth vpon the earth into corne and bread which he daily doth much more abundantly multiply then in times past hee did the poore widowes meale by Elias, yea then Iesus Christ did multiply the loaves in the wilderness. And therefore if wee shall consider how the Almighty creator of heauen and earth causeth so many fruites to grow in this round masse through the distillations of raine, and through through the heate of the Sunne, we holde in great admiration this worthy naturall Alchimie, which he hath set before our eyes in the nature by him created. For all this world is to him as a fornace, and a limbecke wherein he maketh so many goodly and profitable distillations, that it is altogether impossible to expresse in words their worth and value. The earth is this fornace, and all the plants and trees so many limbecks. And if we have in such estimation the distillations made by men following some imitation of nature, this surely is a kinde of Alchimie very worthy of great reputation and wonder. For let vs consider onely what it is that he extracteth out of a vine stocke and the branches. There is no doubt but that this is a plant of no great shew, so that many have doubted whether it might rightfully bee counted amongst trees, for besides that it is crooked, it is so weake that it cannot stand vpright, nor sustaine not onely the branches thereof, but euen it selfe, if it be not alwaies propped, at leastwise when it riseth neuer so little high: And yet this is a marueilous and very rare Limbecke, wherein God conuerteth water into wine, and maketh it to distill out. The like may we say of Oliue trees, figge trees, and many other fruit trees, saying that they make more shew, & retaine more of the nature of a tree, then the vine doth. For all the excellent liquors and fruits, which we draw out of these plants, and all others, are principally caused by the heate of the sunne, and by the waterings of raine from heauen, which by this meanes seemeth to change nature, and put on diuers formes. And yet this sunne, by meanes of whome, as by a fire, God performeth so many sundry and admirable conversions and distillations, hath not his face smeared with coles, to kindle and maintaine his fire, nor yet his faire eye soiled therewith, or with any smoake. So then I hold them very wise, who profit in the contemplation of this Alchimie, and employ their time and cunning therein, as husbandmen doe whotill the earth, attending in good hope after their travell, the blessing which is promised them of God, as he also doth daily send vpon the earth by the effects of the sunne, moone, starres, and planets; of the aire, clouds, raine, and such other meanes which it pleaseth him to vse for the same purpose. For we may fitly say with Salomon, that without this blessing, it is in vaine for those, which eate the bread of their travell, to rise early, and to goe late to bed. For it is he, that hath promised the first and the latter raine, as well for the time to sowe in, as for to ripen and gather fruits in: vsing for this purpose (according to the testimonie of the prophet) great cloudes in forme of chariots, wherupō being borne on the wings of the winde, he maketh the winde his messengers. And sith we are in this talke, before we deale with any other subiect, let vs acquit our selues of that which we haue promised, to entreat in a particular discourse concerning the winde: the charge whereof (A R A M) I impose vpon you.

Of the winde and of their kindes and names: and of the testimonies which we haue in them of the power and maiestie of God. Chapter 51.

A R A M. According to the testimony of Pliny, there are more then twenty Greeke authors and manie other auncients, who haue entreated of the nature of the winde. But to knowe from whence they proceeded, the difficulties and doubts are great and vncertaine amongst them, and amongst all the Philosophers. Yet that is the onely truth, which the diuine Poet teacheth vs, saying, [That the Lord draweth the winde out of his treasures.] Aristotle in his Meteors maintaineth that the winde are produced by the heate of the Sunne: which it seemeth that the author of the naturall historie doth contradict when he saith, that there are certaine caues wherein the winde are ordinarily engendred, as may be seene in a deepe pit, which is in the coasts of Dalmatia at Senta, wherein if one cast any thing, how light soeuer it bee, there issueth sodainely out a whirle winde, although the weather be neuer so calme and faire. And in many obscure places in houses, one shall commonly feele a certaine small winde, as if it were enclosed therein. But we must note that there is much difference betwixt these particularities, or small puffs caused by exhalations, which proceede out of the earth, and that, which is properly named the winde. For they are not felt in one place onely, but haue their course generally through all the earth, and their meanes limited therein to exercise their power. And therefore whether the winde be engendred by continuall motion of the heauen, or by the crosse motions of the Planets, which goe contrary to that of the firmament, or else that the winde bee an aire driven by the sundry turnings of the spheres, and by the multiplicitie of the beames of the celestiaall signes, or else that it proceede from starres particularly appointed to ingender it, or from the fixed starres (for all these opinions are found amongst Philosophers:) yet neuerthelesse we see by experience, that the winde is subiect to the rules and lawes of nature, and that it hath his determinate course, although mans wit cannot pierce to sound the reason of this secret.

Of the names and kindes of the windes.

But for the names and species of these windes, they haue amplie entreated thereof. True it is that the ancients made mention but of fower windes, which they comprised vnder the fower parts of the world. And then the naturall Philosophers appointed twelue, giuing them names taken partly from the regions from which they proceeded, & partly from the effects and qualities which they cause vpon the earth. But the Hydrographers and mariners account sixteene. To haue the vnderstanding of which, wee must note that euery horizon is diuided into fower quarters by two right lines, which crosse in the center thereof: the one of which is correspondent to the Meridian circle, and the other to the verticall circle, which diuideth the same Meridian at right angles, which lines demonstrate the fower principall parts of the earth, that is, the East, West, North, and South part: of which proceed the fower principall windes, to wit, out of the Septentrionall part, the North winde: from the Meridionall the south: from the Orientall the East: and from the Occidentall the West: Betweene which are other middle and notable windes, whose names are compounded of those of the fower foresaid windes, and are therefore called North east, North west, South east, and South west. Then againe each distinction of these eight windes, is consequently diuided into two equall parts, which make the distinctions of eight other windes, called subprincipall, and which compound their names of their two next collateral windes, expressing the most notable first: to wit, Northnortheast, North northwest, South southeast, South southwest, East northeast, East southwest, West northwest, West southwest. Moreouer they that frequent the Mediterrant sea (as Greekes and Italians) doe call the north Transmontano: the south, Austro: east Levante: west, Ponate: northeast, Greco: north west, Maestro, southeast, Sirocho, southwest, Garbin, and so of them compound the names of the other eight windes, which are betwixt them, as hath bene before declared. And wee must note that the windes haue commonly euery one their turne in such sort that when one opposite winde ceaseth and is laid, his contrarie riseth. But if at any time the next winde to that which ceaseth, beginne to blowe, it runs byas-wise from left hand to right, as the sunne doth, and one may know the fourth daie of the moone, what winde will raigne longest during her time. But the easterne windes do longer endure then those which rise towards the west. And the sunne doth strengthen then winde, and also appease it, for at his rising and setting they are commonly greatest, at noone he calmeth them, especially in summer. The winde is also commonly found to lie still, either at midday, or at midnight, for it doth alwaies cease either through great cold, or through vehement heate. Likewise the raine doth make it cease, whereupon this prouerbe sprunge vp, that litle raine allaieth much winde.

Notable things in the windes.

But it is wondrous, that the windes, which are as it were but a puffed, should performe such thinges as men could not doe with their hands, yea though there were a multitude together. For how many people neede there bee, yea horses and oxen yoked together to breake burst, and pull vp the great and mightie trees, which the winde abateth, ouerturneth, breaketh, and rooteth vp, with a blast onely? And herein we haue goodly matter againe, whereby to profite in the acknowledgement of the soueraigne maiestie and almightie providence of the creator and gouernour of all nature. For it is certaine, that as the Lord manifesteth himselfe to men, such as they may comprehend him to bee, when hee calleth the sound and noise of thunder (his voice) that hee performeth admirable thinges, as we haue already noted, wee may perceiue that hee doth the like also by violence of the windes. And therefore the Prophet saith, [I know that the Lord is great, and that our God is aboue all gods. Whatsoever pleased the Lord, that did hee in heauen and in earth, in the Sea, and in all the depths. Hee bringeth vp the cloudes from the endes of the earth, and maketh the lightnings with the raine; hee draweth forth the windes out of his treasures.] It is hee (saith Jeremy) that giueth by his voice the multitude of waters in the heauen, and hee causeth the cloudes to ascend from the endes of the earth, hee casteth out lightnings in the raine, and bringeth forth the winds out of his treasures. [The winde (saith the Preacher) goeth toward the South, and compasseth toward the North: the winde goeth round about and returneth (by his circuits. Now if the blasts of the winds be so strong, it must needs be that the bellows out of which they are blowne must be puissant & mighty. For although it is written of the wicked, that they are so proud and doe presume so much of their force & power, that they seem to be able to ouerthrow men, towns, & fortified places only with a blast; yet neuertheless it is the Lord, who hath the power to abate them, and al the lofty and stout with all their forts and bulwarks: For all the winds together, are but as one little puffle, which passeth from his mouth. Wherefore if in breathing onely, hee driueth and remooueth heaven, earth, and the sea, and all this world; performing acts so great and wonderfull: what may we esteeme of his soueraigne force, when he would employ his whole power? For there is neither winde nor thunder, nor deluges of water, nor any thing that is comparable to the wrath of God, and to the power which he hath to execute his vengeance vpon his enemies. But he employeth his creatures, as the ministers of his wrath, when, and how he pleaseth. And therefore the diuine poet in his canticles, wishing liuely to describe the assistance that God had shewed him, in deliuering him out of the hands of the wicked, and in punishing of them; hee proposeth him comming accompanied with fearefull thunders, with thicke cloudes, with vehement windes and stormes, with lightnings, tempests, great raine, and hails, and darke weather, so that the foundations of the sea, and of the earth couered with waters, were discovered, and the earth was mooued and trembled, the mountaines shooke and bowed because of the fury of the wrath of the Lord. For indeede who is God but the Lord, and who is mighty but our God? Now it is certaine, that because men cannot comprehend the greatnes of the power and wrath of God against the wicked, the holy Ghost doth oftē speak of natural things, by the Prophets for to make them vnderstand by that, which is visible in nature, and which may most astonish and affray them. So then if we shall consider so many excellent points of doctrine concerning the providence of God, as are taught in the schoole of nature, by means of the meteors (as we haue hitherto discoursed) of the clouds, thunders, lightnings, storms, fouds of water, winds, whirlewinds, and tempests, they will serue vs no lesse for preachers, then the celestially bodies do, to manifest vnto vs especially the iudgements and heavy plagues of the almighty, and to make vs oftner thinke thereupon then we do: as also the raines, by the fertility which they cause in the earth, will minister matter vnto vs to acknowledge his blessing, and perpetuall grace vpon those, who feare and honor him. Wherefore we haue rested long ynough in that which particularly concerneth & is dependent vpon the 2. higher elements, the fire and the aire: sauing that, before we entreat of the earth, and of the water, & of the principall things worthy of consideration, in them, we will say somewhat concerning the birds of the aire, seeing that we haue already comprised them, as in truth they must be, amongst the things conioyned and depending vpon the higher elements; I will leave you then (ACHITO) to discourse vpon their nature.

of the Phenix, and of other wilde fowle.*

Chapter 52.

ACHITO. H Aving discoursed (though simply like disciples of Christian doctrine, & not like masters and professors of naturall Philosophie) vpon the two higher elements the fire & the aire, and hauing considered their nature and effects; and the things engendred in them, and by them: It falleth very fitly for vs, to entreate of the visible creatures, which conuerse in the aire, and of which the holy Scripture speaketh in diuers places, vnder the name of the fowles of the aire: considering also that Moses teacheth, that the fowles & fishes were created before any of the terrestriall creatures. For as there is a greater accord between to the two elements of water & aire, then of aire and earth; even so is there a more correspondency of nature between fishes & foules, then between beasts of the earth & fowles. For the flying of birds in the aire is like the swimming of fishes in the water. Moreover, there are many water-fowles, which are as it were of a middle nature between those which couerle but only in the aire, or in the earth, & which therein receiue their nouriture, & between the fishes that liue in the waters. For these birds flye in the aire like other birds, & swim also in the water like fishes, & liue partly in the water & partly in the aire. For intreat particularly of theſe things, it ſeemeth good to me to note vpon the beginning of our diſcourſe concerning living creatures, that there are 2. principall kinds of living creatures, the firſt are thoſe, which have life in every part being diuided and cut aſunder, called in Latine (Inſecta) becauſe of the inciſions which they ſeeme to have vpon their bodies, and which are engendred of putrifaction. The ſecond ſort is of perfect creatures, to whom the former properties agree not, but they have their generation through propagation & race. Now we muſt hereafter ſpeake of inſect creatures. And for the perfect, there are found nine principall kinds of them, wherof ſome remaine onely in the aire, & have no feet, as the bird called (Manucodiata) other conuerſe in the aire and in the earth, as (the Eagle) and ſundry other birds: ſome are earthly, and yet like foules neuertheleſs, as is (the Eltridge) ſome inhabite both in the earth and in the water, as (the Beauer) called in Latine (Fiber): ſome foules ſwim as (the ſwan): ſome creatures are flying fiſhes: others are altogether earthly (as the dogs): ſome keep vader ground as (the Mole): others liue in the water onely as (the dolphin): our ſpeech then ſhall be concerning theſe nine kinds of creatures, and we will briefly diſcourſe of ſome of the moſt excellent of them.

Now to begin with the birds according as the order of our treatiſe doth require, we will ſpeake of the Manucodiata, comonly called the bird of God, or of paradife, according to the interpretation of the Indian name, which bird is found dead vpon the earth, or in the ſea, in the Iſles named the Malucos, becauſe it is neuer ſeene aliue out of the aire. For this bird onely hath no feet, for that it abideth aloft in the aire, and far out of mans ſight, hauing the body and beake ilke a ſwallow, both in bigneſs and forme. The feathers of his wings and taile, are longer then thoſe of a ſparrow hawke, but very ſlender, agreeable to the ſmaleneſs of the bird. The back of the cock is holow, whereby reaſon ſheweth, that the hen layeth her eggs in this hollowneſs, ſeeing that ſhe hath the like creuiſe in her belly, ſo that by meanes of both theſe pits ſhe may hatch her eggs. The meat of this foule is the dew of heauen, which ſerueth it for meat and drink, it neuer faileth, but through age onely, & ſo long as they liue they ſuſtaine themſelues with their owne wings, and their taile being ſpred out in a roundneſs, by which meanes it doth more commodiouſly inhabite in the aire.

Next I proceede to the birds which conuerſe in the aire, and in the earth, of which the Eagle for greatneſs and ſtrength beareth away the price. Pliny ſetteth downe ſixe kindes, of which the leaſt in body, called the blacke Eagle, is ſtrongeſt, and it of all others doth onely nourish her eaglets. For all the reſt chaſe and drive away their young ones, becauſe that when they haue them, their nailes and claws are turned vpside downe, as if nature would declare herſelfe very prouident in this, to deprive the eagle of all meanes to helpe it ſelfe with any more purchaſe, then will euen ſerue her owne turne, for otherwiſe it would deſtroy all the young veniſon of a countrey, therefore through hunger which by this occaſion they doe then ſuſtaine, they become white and hate their yong ones. But the Oſtfragi, which are another ſort of wild eagles, do, as diuers affirme, gather together the yong eaglets which their damme hath expelled, and doe nourish them with their owne. And eagles neuer die through age, or any other malady but for hunger onely, their vppermoſt beake growing ſo great and ſo crooked, that it is impoſſible for them to open their mouthes to feede themſelues. Their feathers being mingled with the feathers of other birds, doe deuoure and conſume them.

The Phenix is ſaid to be found in no other place of the world but onely in Arabia, and is very ſeldome ſeene. It is as big as an Eagle, and the plumes of her taile are gilded, being intermixed with certaine blew and carnation feathers, the reſt of her body being of a purple colour. Shee hath her head decked with exquisite plumes, and with a tuft of very goodly feathers. Shee liueth ſixe hundred and ſixtie yeares, as Manilius a Senator of Rome recordeth, and ſo Plinie doth make report. And feeling herſelfe aged, ſhe maketh her neſt with pieces of Cynamon and Incenſe, and hauing filled it with all ſorts of aromaticall odors, ſhe dieth thereupon. And out of her marrow and bones there cometh firſt a worme, which afterward turneth to a little birde, that in time prooueth another Phenix.

Some report almoſt the very ſame of a bird called Semenda, which is found in the miſt of India, which hath her bil clouen into three parts, boared & pearced euery where through, and ſhe ſingeth at her death as the Swan doth. Afterward by beating of her wings ſhe kindleth a fire made of the twigs of a vine, which ſhe gathereth together, wherewith ſhe is burned, and of her aſhes there is a worme engendred, of which ſpringeth againe another like birde.

Swans are birds cleane white, and differ but little from geese, except in bignes. They sing sweetlier then any other foules. Their property is to teare their young ones in pieces and to deuour them, for which cause they are very rare to be found. And some say, that they pre- sage their death by their songs.

Of Swans

Cranes come from the farthest orientall seas of India into the regions of Europe: and do neuer part from any place, but that they seeme to do it with counsell, and by the common consent of all: and by the same meanes they elect a king to conduct them. They alwaies soare very high, so to make a farther discovery of the countrey. Every troupe hath a captaine who is alwaies in the reereward: at which only cry al the rest do obey & do keep their ranks and order; and each of them taketh his place by turnes. They doe also set their night watch and keepe sentinell one after another. The sentinell standeth vpon one foot only, holding a little stone in the other, to the end, that if hee happen to sleep, the stone which falleth out of his paw might waken him. All the rest do this while sleepe, hauing their head vnder their wing, keeping watch neuertheles, sometimes vpon one foot, sometimes vpon another. But their captaine holdeth his head alwaies in the aire, to make signe to the rest, of what they are to doe.

Of Cranes.

The Storkes are resident in winter in Egypt & in Africa: & in summer many other warme countries. When they will passe to any countrey, they do all assemble in one place at a day appointed, & so depart in a troupe. Some say they haue no tongus. In Thumenstia this kind of foule is had in such respect, because they rid the countrey of serpents, that no man dare kill any one vpon paine of hanging, & to be punished as an homicide: for such are the lawes of the countrey. And in Suesstia the like is almost vsed. The storkes do neuer change their nests: and do retaine this property by nature, that the young ones nourish the old so long as they liue.

Of Storkes.

Wild geese are a kind of wild foules as the foresaid birds, they make their squadrons pointed like a beake of a ship, (for so they cut the aire better then if they should fly in a square) and they spred themselves abroad by little and little behind like a corner, the better to gain the wind, which guideth them. The hindermost do commonly rest their heads vpon the foremost, and when the guide is weary of going before, he commeth hindmost, to the end that every one may keepe his turne.

Quailes are also a kinde of flying foules, very small of body, but singular in diuers properties. They soare not very high in the aire in these countries, but fly neere to the ground. They fly in troupes, and that sometimes to the great danger of those which saile vpon the sea, or are neere the ground. For these birds do perch in so great number by night vpon the sailes, that they oftentimes sinke barks and small vessels. They know their ordinary pearches, and do neuer fly abroad in a south winde, because it is too heavy, and too moist: and yet they must of necessity be aided by the winde, to performe their voyage, by reason that their bodies are more heavy then their wings can sustaine. And therefore they hang their wings, as if they were pained with flying. So then they make choice of northerne winde for their comming: And when they retire themselves, they assemble their troupes. If the wind be contrary to them, they swallow much grauell, and take little stones in their tallents, to make themselves more heauie, that they may not be carried away by the winde.

Of Quailes.

Swallowes also are a kinde of wilde fowle, for they goe away in winter. But they retire not themselves very farre off, but keepe in those coasts, which are warmed with the Sunne, many are seene bare and vnfledged. This bird onely of all those that haue not crooked claws, doth feed on flesh. One may put in the number of wilde fowles, Blacke birdes, Thrushes, Stares, Ringdowes and Pigeons, although they vse not to returne to farre countries. But they mew not as others do, neither keep themselves close, for they are vsually seen in the countrey where they winter. The property of Stares is to go in a great troupe together and to flie in a round, every one of them endeavouring to gaine the middle place. The Swallow onely of all other birds flieth askew, and is passing quicke of wing; so likewise is it hardest of all birdes to be taken. Moreover it is peculiar to her, not to feed but in flying. Thus then you see what I thought to deduce briefly concerning wilde fowle. You A S E R and of their wit and industry. Chap. 53.*

A SER. Nature sheweth her selfe very admirable, in that she doth not produce every thing indifferently in all places; nor doth priuiledge some countries rather then others, as well for plants, as for liuing creatures indued with sense: so that many times that which men thinketo bring home for mere stranges, dieth before it come there. To declare, that it is very difficult (if not altogether impossible) to make any thing liue in what place soeuer, against the ordinance of nature. So it was, that in the whole Isle of Rhodes there could not be found one only nest of an Eagle, though that in the neighbouring territories there were enough. So though the lake of Como, which is on the other side of the river Po in Italy, be very plentifull in fruit trees and faire pastorage: yet for all this there cannot be found within eight miles almost one stork. It is said also, that in all Tarentum there is not one Wood pecker to be found. And in the territory of Athens, the partridges passe not the limits of Boeotia: So in Mar Maggiore, or the Euxine sea, there is no fowle seene. And in Volaterra the ring doves are seene to come every yeere in great volles ouer the sea. But besides all this, there is great difference in seasons for birds: for some appeare all the yeere long, others shew themselves but halfe the yeere, and some are seene abroad but three months. Some also go away presently after they haue hatched & brought vp their young ones. But aboue all, there are marvellous things found in singing birds. For some there are which change their feathers and their note, one season of the yeere; so that one would say, they were quite other birds, which hapneth not to the greater fowles, except to the crane, which waxeth blacke in age. Black birds, which are naturally black, being old become of a reddish colour. They sing in sommer: in winter they do but chatter, and are altogether dumbe, when the daies begin to lengthen, as about mid December: and the cock of a yeere old, haue an ivory white bill. Thrushes haue their necke particoloured in summer, but in winter it is all of one colour.

Rarenes, and changes of many birds.

Of blackbirds.

Nightingale.

But amongst singing birds the nightingale is most admirable. For it is a miracle that so shrill a voice can proceed out of so small a body, and that it can hold breath so long. Moreover it hath a very harmonious note, and perfectly muscalle. For sometimes she draweth out her notes long, another while she quauers: straightwaies she cuts her tune short, & then she will warble, as if it were by muscalle crotchets. Another time she will whistle producing her notes with one breath, by and by quickening her tune, as if it were by semibreues, sometimes abasing her voice, presently raising it, and by and by after cutting it thicke and short. Sometimes also she will make the points of the organes, lifting her voice high like a pipe, when she listeth, obseruing sometimes the treble, sometimes the base, and sometimes the countertenor. Finally, there is no instrument in the world, wherein one may find more perfect musick, then this which resoundeth in so small a throat. And that which merits greater maruell in this bird, is, that there are many songs all different, and that every nightingale hath her owne in particular. So also they debate amongst themselves who shall sing best, contending herein one against another: so that sometimes the vanquished cease rather through want of breath, then of song. And the young little nightingales hearken to the old, & do record by themselves apart, the songs which they heard, from point to point: so that these disciples, after they haue attentively hearkened, doe repeate the lesson which they haue learned, and then cease. Then may one heare the reprehensions of the Schoole-master, and may very well discern when the Scholler is waxt cunning. Moreover the excellency of their singing doth not commonly endure aboue fifteene daies and fifteene nights: all which time they sing without ceasing: and that is when the trees begin to waxe thicke of leaues in springtime. And afterwards this great melody beginneth by little and little to cease: and yet not so, that one may perceiue to bee weary of their singing. And when the heate begins to trouble them, they whistle not as before, but change their voice and sing a full note. They also mew and change feathers. To conclude, they retire themselves in winter like all other wilde fowle.

Of Finches, and Linnets, Parrots, and Pies.

Also Finches and Linnets are numbred amongst those little birds, that sing very harmoniously, and easily retaine that which is taught them, whether it bee in voice, or by any demonstration demonstration that they may imitate either in foote or bill. But aboue all birds, parrats doe most counterfeite the voice and speach of man. They come from the Indies, and haue commonly their feathers greene, except onely a collar of red vermillion feathers that compasseth their necke: this bird speaketh all that which one will takes paines to teach her. It loveth wine much, and having well drunke, is much pleasanter. There is likewise a kinde of Pies which do pronounce better that which is taught them, then the parrats do: yet are they not so much accounted of, because they are ordinary with vs. They take pleasure in the words which they speake, and do so delight in them, that one shall often finde them studying very attentively by themselves, that which hath bene shewed them. Crows also do easily learne to speake, and shew many testimonies of great wit and industry. There was one in the time of the Emperor Tiberius so admired and loved of the people of Rome, that they reuenged cruelly the death thereof vpon him that kilde it. It had bene nourished by a shoemaker, and so taught and instructed, that it flew euery morning to the palace to salute the Emperor, and after him all the other princes, naming them by their names, and then returned to the shop to her master, continuing this vse for many yeeres, to the great astonishment of euery one. It hapned that a certen spitefull neighbour of this shoemaker, taking occasion for that this crow had mated vpon some of his ware, did kill it. Whereat the people took such indignation, that they caused this poore merchant to loose his life: preparing on the other side very magnificent funerals for the bird. For the carcasse thereof was covered ouer with nosegayes and chaplets of flowers, and borne by two Moores to the fire, which was kindled in a void place; there to burne it solemnly; so much was the vnderstanding of this crow esteemed in a city, where many Princes and great Personages had died before, and none would solemnize their funerals: & wherein there was none that would reuenge the death of Scipio Africanus, though he had conquered the Carthaginians and Numantines.

A marueilous history of a crow.

But since we are lighted vpon a discourse concerning a kind of towardnes and facility to learne, which is found in many birds, we may not passe ouer in silence the marueilous industry of their architecture, in the building of their nests: for all of them, and especially the small ones doe vse a wonderfull dexterity therin. And that I may not be too tedious in this point, I will produce for testimony but the swallowes onely, who builde their nests of dirt or clay, and strengthen them with straw. And if perhaps the drines of the weather will not minister dire enough for them, then they load themselves with water, which they shake vpon the ground, to moisten the dust, and to make slime. The inside of the nest is all covered and lined with downe and flockes, both of woll, and of other things; to the end to keep their egges warme, and that their young ones may afterward finde their bedde soft. Which they alwaies keepe very cleane, by casting very carefully out of it all the ordures of their litle ones, which being growne bigger they teach to mure out of the nest. There is another kind of field swallowes, which doe seldome make their nests in houses; and yet they make the of such stuff as the others do, though not after the same maner: for all their nests are turned vpside down, and haue a verie streight mouth, but a large paunch: so that it is an admirable thing to see the industrie, which they vse to keepe their yong ones soft and warme. Of the nests of these swallowes ioyned and fastned one vpon another, there is a bancke in the mouth of Nilus which is neere to Hiraclia in Egypt, (as Plinie reciteth) of sixe and twenty paces in length, and so strong that it resisteth the ragings and inundations of this floud: a thing which one may say were impossible to be performed by the hand of man. But we should finde writing matter enough to fill vp a great volume, if wee were minded to entreat of all the excellent properties which are in the nature of birdes: but our entent is not to dwell long vpon this subiect; as namely, to speake of all their different species, whereof many learned men haue written: but onely to consider summarily of certaine of the most notable, as we will do in regard of all other creatures both liuing and destitue of life; to the end that wee may nothing at all deprive any part of this Vniuers, which we doe here contemplate, of those goodly portraictures of the diuine maiestie, which are ingrauen in euery part from the highest heauen to the lowest center of this terrestriall masse. Looke then (A M A N A) what birds you hold most worthy to haue place in your discourse.

Of the industry of birds in making their nests.

Lib. 10. hist. nat.

Of the Estridge, of the Peacocke, of the Cocke, and of other foules. Chap. 54.

Of the Estridge.

AMANA. AS we haue heretofore heard of a birde that neuer abideth vpon the earth, so contrariwise the Estridge that doth alwayes stay vpon the earth, neuer mounting aloft to take the aire. This is as big a bird as any other, and is common in Africa and in Ethiopia. It hath a long necke like a camell, the beake, eies, and head like to a goose, but that they are much greater: their wings and taile haue feathers of diuers colours, skie coloured, white, red, black and greene, and there is no bird which hath such faire plumes, of which those feathers are made wherewith men of war adorne their helmets. The Estridges passe horses in swiftnes, beeing heerein aided with the wings which Nature hath bestowed vpon them, although they fly not at all, neither rise from the ground, but runne with their wings spread. They haue feet like an hart: with which (men say) they vse to take vp and cast stones at those which chase them when they fly. It is also saide they swallow and digest iron: which commeth to passe through the vehement heat and thickeness of their beily. Some also haue reported, that the Estridge hatcheth her egges with her eies: but the truth is, that shee onely watcheth them, because that her young ones are brought forth by the heat of the sun. The manner of taking this bird is very easie; for when she is weary of running, he is of so foolish a nature, that he thinketh himselfe closely hidden, when he is onely in the shade of some tree or shrub; so that it is then easie to approach him so neere as the pursuer will desire.

Of the peacocke.

But let vs speake of the birde, which for the beauty and sense which it hath, doth merit the chiefe dedree amongst the greater sorts of birdes, to witte, the Peacocke. For when he knowes that men esleame him, then turneth he round to shew his colours shining like precious stones: and sets them directly against the sunne, to give them a better lustre. And he assayeth also to do so with his taile, spreading it round and shewing those colours, which seeme fairest in the shade, drawing all the eies thereof abroad, as if hee knew best how to make himselfe most noted. And when he hath lost his taile (as he doth every yeere at the fall of the leafe) he hideth himselfe, as if he mourned, till the next spring, when his taile groweth againe. It is marvellous that this part of the Peacock is so filled with the eies, being so long and thick of feathers of sundry colors, and so splendant. And yet neither the colour of white nor of black, this being of it selfe sad, & that obscuring all colors) are found in the taile of this bird. Which bird liueth ordinarily five and twenty yeeres, and at three yeeres he beginneth to shoot the sundry colors which he hath in his feathers, and knoweth his beauty, and seemeth to reioyce that men do maruaile at his taile when they see it, and therefore he will hold it vp, be he neuer so weary.

Of the Cocke.

Next to the proude nature of the peacocke, that lofty birde seemeth to resemble a Sentinell, which nature hath appointed to interrupt mens sleepe and call them to worke, that is, the Cocke. For wheresoeuer he is he will be master, and command all the rest of the foules. And if there bee two together then must this rule remaine to the strongest, and he must get it by those weapons which Nature hath placed in his legs: wherein they put such trust, that the issue of their combate, doth oftentimes fall out with the death of the one or other. And he which remaineth victor, makes signe of his conquest by his crowing, sounding himselfe his owne tantaraes: and the vanquished runnes and hides himselfe. This lofty bird marcheth proudly, holding vp his necke stiffe, and his combe aloft, except hee bee not well. And there is no bird which doth oftner cast his eie towards heaven, then this: for he alwaies beholdeth it, holding his taile vp, and yet crooked like a sickle: so that arming himselfe after this manner, he puts the Lion in feare, which is the stoutest of all beastes. Moreouer, the Cocke by a secret instinct of Nature knoweth the course of the Starres, and diuideth the day by his crowing from three houres to three houres. They rouse at Sunne set, and neuer let the Sunne rise, without aduertising men: for with their crowing, which is accompanied with beating of their wings, they giue notice of the day. And their voice is heard very farre off, yea in the night time a mile, or more. The Romans honoured so much the maiesty of this bird, that they iudged of the good or ill lucke of their Augurations, by the countenance which he shewed, being either pleasant or not, at such time as he fed.

Hens are of the kinde of domesticall birds, renowned aboueall the delicatenesse of their flesh, and goodnes of their egges, beeing much better then all other, and which are most vsed in meates and medicines. They lay at all times, except the two first moneths of winter, when they commonly rest themselves. So is it the first and last bird that layeth, and is so fruitfull that there are some will lay fixtie egges together, without missing one day. Whereupon wee will note that in all yolkes of egges, there is a little drope of bloud in the middest, which is holden to bee the heart of the bird, because this member is esteemed to be first formed in all liuing creatures. And indeede this little drope tasteth very salt, and stirreth in the egge. And for that which particularly concerneth the chicken, it is certaine that the body thereof is made of the white of the egge: for being formed, it is nourished by the yolke. And so long as it is in the shell, it hath the head bigger then all the body, and the eies which are shut, bigger then the head. And when it beginneth to grow, the white of the egge retireth to the midst, and the yolke disperfeth it selfe round about. And if at the twentieth day one take the egge, they may heare the chicken peepe within. For from that time forward it beginneth to waxe feathered, and to get strength: and stiaeth not long in consuming the whole yolke, but presently beginneth to open the shell. And it is to be noted, that as well this as all other foules, come out of their shels with their feete forwardes, contrary to other liuing creatures. Moreover the hen is knowne to be good, when her crest is straight and sometimes double, and hir feathers blacke, and in some places red: as also when the clawes of her foote are faire. But aboue all there is nothing more worthie of great admiration, then the care which it taketh to hatch and nourish her chickens: yea though they bee not of hir owne kinde. And it is a pretie pastime to make an hen hatch ducke egges. For at first when they open the shell, shee knoweth them not; and neuertheles having beene a little accustomed to them, she doth nourish them as carefully as if they were naturally her owne. And when these yong duckes, according to their kinde, cast themselves into the water, it is a wonder to see the mourning of the hen, fearing least ill should betide them.

The pigeon likewise is an house bird much to be considered of, and bringeth no lesse profit and commoditie then pullen doe. It is very chaste by nature, and neuer changeth mate neither cocke nor hen, and yet the cocks are very rude towards the hennes beating them with their bills, and chiding them with a kinde of grumbling in their throat, as if they were ielous. But afterwards as if they repented themselves, they make much of them, and bill together, running round about them, and specially when their time of treading is come. Both cocke and hen take great paines to hatch their yong ones, insomuch that when the hens are idle, and tarrie not in the nest, the cockes will correct and beate them with their beakes. But they doe likewise aide them, as well helping them to make their nests, as to serue them while they hatch, yea and the cocke doth sometimes hatch in the day time. It is their propertie to bill together before they treade. And they lay ordinarily two egges, out of which issue both cocke and hen, that is the cocke first, and the hen the morow after. They hatch commonly eightene or twentie daies, and breed after fve times treading. And one shall sometimes finde egges with little pigeons in them: and shall see in one nest some yong ones but newly out of the shell and some that are ready to flye. They may lay egges eight or ten times a yere: but the ordinary vse is to take out foure good layings. They are of sundry colours of feathers, but the ashe coloured, or the browne, or the blacke are the best: the rough footed, and tufted are most barren and domesticall: so are the blacke and white chekered: but those that seeme guilded about the necke, and that haue the eie and foote redde, are the freest and fruitfullnest: the white are good to hatch, and most in danger of the Kite, and birds of prey: the yealow and red are very barren. They haue all this maruellous qualitie, to giue their yong ones at first some corne of salt grauell, so to pronoke their appetite, and season them to eate, when time shall be. Now mee thinketh, wee haue stiaied long enough in this matter, sith we will not heere describe a naturall history of creatures: and sith that which wee haue discoursed concerning fowles, hath beene onely for that wee will not deprive the aire of the naturall creatures thereof; as we will endeavour to doe the like in the behalfe of the earth and water: whereof the sequele of our speecch requireth vs to entreate, to accomplish our discourse concerning the elements. First then let vs speake of the earth, and of the firmenesse, figure and quantitie thereof. And it is your turpe (A R A M) to dicourse thereupon.

qualitie thereof. Chapter 55.*

A R A M. AS wee have heretofore heard that vnder the name of heauen is comprised commonly both the supreme and middle region of aire, and all things also, which are conioyned vnto them, and depending vpon their effects, namely of the two higher elements the fire, and the aire: so by the name of earth, we do often vnderstand not onely the lowest element of all, which is as the foot of all this mundane frame: but also the sea, which is next to it, and the lakes, ponds, fountaines, riuers, and other waters, and all that is contained in them, and in the earth, and which receiueth life, and nourishment, whether they be men, beasts of all kindes, plants, trees, hearbs, fruits, mettals, mines, minerals, stones, and generally all other things produced here below for the vse of al other creatures. Pursuing then the order of our discourse, wee will first intreate of that which concernes in generall the terrestriall globe, and afterwards will meditate of the most rare beauties, which enrich the parts thereof, to the end to represent vnto our selues more and more the greatnes and glory of the creator of all these things, as wee haue already well begun in the matters by vs hitherto intreated of.

Situation of the earth.

Immobilitie of the earth.

The earth
habitable throughout.

That the earth is round

The earth is of insensible quantitie.

Now it is certaine, that by reason of the waight and heauines of the earth, it is necessarily situated in the midst of the world, as the center thereof, beeing the lowest place, and the farthest remote from the circumference of the whole. And from which the earth cannot be parted, (for otherwise it should mount a loft contrarie to the naturall inclination thereof) as likewise it cannot be mooued by the first and vniuersall motion of all the spheres, by reason of the foresaide heauines thereof, and subtiltie of the other elements, which are about it: and againe because it is of insensible quantitie in respect of the whole world, as beeing the point and center thereof, beeing also vnmoueable, to the end that the motion of the heauens might thereby be discerned, and that which dependeth thereupon. And as the state of the elementarie fire doth not extend beyond the fire, and as that of the water is in the place of water, and that of the aire where the aire should bee, so the earth can retaine no place but in it selfe; because that the other elements cannot suffer it to rest vpon them. Which causeth that it remaineth hanged amongst them, not being able to fall, nor decline more towards one place, then another. Wherefore also it is made habitable in euery part (except it be by accident,) so that men are therefore Antipodes one to another that is, going feete against feete, hauing neuertheles all of them their heads towards heauen, and meeting each of them in the midst of the earth. Now that it is iustly situate in the midst of the vniuers, one may see by experience of the daies & nights, which are equall throughout the whole earth, so often as the sunne is in the midst of heauen betwixt the poles of the world; as also by the augmentations and diminutions of the same daies and nights regularly proportioned one to another (as wee haue demonstrated in our precedent discourses vpon the celestiaall spheres) and likewise by the eclipses of the moone, and by the inclination of shadowes, which at noontide are one proportionable to another, as well on the meridionall, as on the septentrionall part. Moreouer there is no doubt, but the earth (together with the whole element of water, which is spread abroad and dispersed in diuers armes, and portions about it) is of a round and circular figure in all parts: for as the mountaines and valleies they are insensible in regard of the whole globe of the earth. The roundnesse whereof doth euidently declare it selfe by the shadow thereof, which sheweth it selfe in the eclipses of the Moone to be round: for it could not seeme so, if the earth were not also of the same forme. Moreouer, the diuerse and certaine supputation that Astronomers calculate concerning the times of the eclipses of the moone, according as the places are more orientall, or more occidentall, doth manifestly conclude the same round forme: so also doth the naturall inclination of all the parts of the earth, and of the water, who still tend downe declining to a lower place, and this common descent of euery part causeth this round figure. Consequently it is to bee noted, that this earthly frame, although it be in it selfe of marvellous greatnes, yet is it of very little and insensible quantity, in regarde and comparison not onely of all the firmament, but also of the sphere of the sunne

Of the earth and of the situation thereof. 763

sunne, the same earth being but as a point in the middle of the whole world, which is apparently demonstrated by the foresaid equalities of the daies and nights, and by the obseruations of the courses of the celestiall bodies, and chiefly of the sunne, taken here below by instruments fit for such effects, in such manner as if one were in the center of the world. For in a little space that one may passe here vpon the earth proceeding from one place to another, the view and disposition of heauen doth change and vary notably. And in an open plaine place wherein one may stand vpon the earth, or bee in in the sea, they may alwaies discover the one halfe of heauen. All which things declare (as we haue said) that the earth and the water make a round globe, which is but as a point and center in regarde of the vniuersall world.

So much for the situation, immobilitie, figure, and quantitie of the earth; which onely above all other elements hath merited the title of a mother, by reason of the great good which it affordeth to all breathing and living creatures. For this gentle mother receiveth vs when wee are borne, shee nourisheth vs being borne; shee maintaineth and sustaineth vs being nourished; and finally, when the other elements refuse and leaue vs, shee receiveth vs into her bosome, and couereth vs, hauing (as it were) a perpetuall care of vs. Moreover, shee riseth not vp against man as other creatures doe. For the water conuerteth it selfe into raine, snow, and haile; it swelleth in surges and waues, and ouerfloweth all with floods; the aire thickeneth and ladeth it selfe with cloudes, out of which proceede stormes and tempests; and the fire is often cause of strange calamities vpon earth. But this gentle and debonaire mother maketh her selfe as a slave to serue for all the commodities of man. For how many things do we cause her to beare by force, and how many things doth she bestow of her own good will? What odours and perfumes, what saours, what iuices, what, and how many sorts of colours? With what exchange and interest doth shee restore that, which is lent her? How many sundry things doth shee nourish for man? What quantitie of precious mettals doth shee conceive, and keepe in her entrailes for his vse? And therefore it seemeth that the earth subsisteth not of one onely kinde: and indeede Aristotle diuideth it into two; the one fossible, which may bee digged; and the other transmutable, which may change qualitie. For the fossible earth, it doth alwaies remaine the same, and is very earth: but the transmutable remaineth not the same in kinde, and in view; for it conuerteth it selfe into mettall, or into iuice, or into some other matter. But before wee doe proceede vnto the consideration of so many admirable effectes produced by the earth: wee may nowe heare behold, that wee haue summarily set downe particulars enough, wherein we may learne to acknowledge the infinite power, wisdom, and bountie of God the creatour: and how according to the testimony of the angels, all the earth is full of his glorie. For first of all, is not this a great wonder, that the earth which is so huge a masse, and the heaviest eliment of all the rest, should bee hanged in the aire in the midst of the world, being so counterpoised, that it sustaineth, as one may say, all the other elements; and that it is inuironed by them, and by all the other spheres and celestiall bodies, it remaining firme for ever, not moouing from the place thereof? For where are the columnes and the pillars which beare and sustaine it, and vpon what foundation are they founded? And therefore it is not without cause, that the Lord saith to Iob, minding to cause him to acknowledge his power and maiestie, [where wast thou when I laide the foundations of the earth? declare if thou hast vnderstanding, who hath laide the measure thereof, if thou knowest? Or who hath stretched the line over it? (to wit, to signe and marke out the foundations thereof) whereupon are the foundations thereof set? Or who hath laid the corner stone thereof?] And afterwards hee addeth. [It is turned as clay to fashion.] Wherein it seemeth that hee had reference to that, that hee created the earth (as all this great visible world) in round forme, because it is the most capable of all forme that may be. Behold then the testimonie that God himselfe deliuereth to Iob his seruant of the admirable creation of the earth. And to the same purpose the Kingly Prophet saith, that God did forme the earth vpon the bases thereof (that is to say, vpon the foundations) so that it shall never mooue. But what may wee say then to the motions and tremblings of the earth, which haue euer beene knowne, and are ordinarily seene? This might seeme repugnant to that, which David here speaketh, and to that which we haue deliuered concerning the immobilitie and firmenesse of the earth. And therefore mine aduice is, that pursuing this discourse, wee should consider the causes of such tremblings; to the end that wee

Of earth-quakes. Chapter 56.

ACHITOB. Forasmuch as the earth is not only heavy by nature, but even the heaviest of all elements, and is heaped vp and compacted together in the midst of the great vniuersall world, as the point and center thereof, it therefore followeth that it is immooueable, and without any naturall motion. For if it had any, as the other elements haue, it is certaine, that it must bee downewards. But because that God hath placed the earth in the midst of all his workes, towards which all heavy things tende and descend, it cannot descend lower then it is by the nature thereof. And therefore because it is solide and thicke, and not liquide and fluent as the water and the aire, it cannot glide as they doe, nor remooue out of one place into another, if it bee not by some violence elsewhere mooued and made to stirre, and tremble somewhere, as it hath happened through diuers and marvellous earthquakes, of which histories and the holy scripture it selfe doe giue euidence. Wee must note then, that there are diuers sorts of motions, by which the earth is so shaken, that it listeth and casteth some parts, sometimes vpwards, sometimes downewards. And it is long of such motions and tremblings, that there haue such masses and heapes beene cast out of it, that great isles haue beene newly made, as Geographers doe witnesse, namely the isle of Rhodes, and of Selos. It sometimes also happeneth, that the motions of the earth bee such, that it openeth like a great gulph, wherein to some parts thereof are cleane swallowed vp and deuoured, together with the countries, and twones situate therein, so that there hath beene no marke left of them, no more then as if they had neuer beene. And it hath often hapned in such cases, that some mountaines haue fallen one against another, because the earth, which was betwixt them hath suncke, and beene swallowed cleane vp. And then one might say, that the proverbe is not ever true, which saith, that two mountaines neuer meete. That is yet another kinde of motion, wherein the earth mooueth and shaketh, sometimes one way, sometimes another way, and tottereth like a ship that floateth on the water. Which kinde of trembling is most dangerous as also when all the motion runneth one way. Then is there yet another motion, which philosophers properly call (trembling) to wit, when two motions are opposite one to another. And this is least dangerous of all: although indeed they bee all very fearefull, yet the feare is much greater, when the tremblings continue with horrible and fearefull sounds like the bellowing of buls, and as if the earth and all nature quaked and groaned, being fore pressed and forced, as is oftentimes seene.

sorts of earthquakes.

Of the causes of earthquakes.

Now for the causes of all these kinds of earthquakes, I may well say, that there is no point in all naturall philosophie, wherein the professors of this science find themselves more intricately intangled, nor wherein they more differ in opinions then in this. For the Chaldeans and Astronomers referre the causes of motions and earthquakes, to the heauen, to starres, and to the planets, and many philosophers assigne it to the water: And yet those which are of this opinion differ amongst themselves. For some suppose that the earth floateth vpon the water like a ship because it is enuironed with water, according to the naturall order of the disposition of the elements: whereby it is diuersly mooued. Others do attribute the cause of earth quakes to those waters onely which are inclosed within the vaines and caues of the earth. Some also to the fire: and some to the windes shut vp within it: and some to the heate chased by the cold, which striueth against it, and causeth it to searce an issue out. For as the water vndermineth the earth, and those places through which it doth passe: euen so may the fire doe: and if either of them be so enclosed, that they cannot finde an easie issue, they strue then to doe it by force and violence. So doe the windes, and the heate chased by the cold. So then, if the earth by vndermined, it is no maruell if the vpper part sinke and fall downe, being swallowed vp, as into a gulfhe, considering that the earth, because of the heauiness thereof, tendeth alwaies downeward towards the center thereof, which is the midst of it, and of all the world. And if the waters, or the fire or the windes inclosed and shut vp in the earth, or the contrary qualities, which contend one with another, cannot finde a passage or issue, their power is so great, that that they constrain the earth, which resisteth them, and by forcing it, make it to cleave and open, and to remoue, and to shake in those places, wherein it is forced: Concerning all which things, one may make a neere coniecture, by the force and violence which is seen in ordinance and artillerie. For euery one beholdeth what force there is by meanes of fire and of the matter inclosed within, to wit, powder, and of the contrarie qualities whereof it is compounded, and of the winde that therein is ingendred, not onely to drive out with marvellous violence all the charge that therein is, but also many times to burst the peece it selfe, if there bee any resistance to hinder it that it discharge not quickly, or if it be not well made, and very strong, and well proportioned to the charge. Wee behold also, what a winde there issueth out, and what noise it maketh, and how the noise makes the earth to sound and tremble: and oftentimes it happeneth, that this onely winde killeth those that stand neere the cannons mouth, such is the violence thereof, although they bee not touched at all with the bullet, that it shootheth. But wee beholde more cleerely in mines, which are made vnder ground, the violence of this powder, when it is therein inclosed with the fire, which is set thereto by traines. For there is neither towne nor castle, be they neuer so well founded, nor any fortresse, which is not onely shaken, but overturned also, like as by an horrible earth-quake. Wherein wee may note, how that it hath not bin sufficient for men, to counterfeit thunders, and lightnings in artillerie, but they haue also inuented the meanes to represent the motions and shakings of the earth: in such manner as we haue signified. There are some philosophers also, who haue taught, that the same reason is in earthquakes, as there is in the shaking of mens bodies: and that they are like feuers and maladies of the earth, which come vnto it through diuers causes, saue that they hold not all the body thereof, as they doe in men, but onely some parts of it. For they argue that the water is in the earth, as the blood, which hath his course through the veines of mans body; and the winde is as the vitall spirits, which passe through the arteries thereof. And as there happen diuers stoppings in the bodie, which hinder the blood, and vitall spirits, that they cannot keepe their right course and ordinarie passage, whereupon their order is troubled, and the body pained, in such sort that groanes ensue, and difficultie of breathing, shakings, and such like accidents: So is it with the body of the earth, when any thing happens to it contrarie to the naturall disposition thereof, by the meanes which wee haue already heard, whether by water, by fire, by winde and such like. Whereto we will adde also this opinion of those, who attribute the cause of such motions and tremblings, either to the drinelle of the earth which is the occasion, that it cleaueth and chappeth, and by this meanes giues open way to the aire and to the windes, which penetrate therinto; or else because of the older age thereof, to which they esteeme all creatures subiect: whereupon it happeneth to it, as to old buildings, which beeing ruinous and almost rotten, doe fall downe in some places of themselves.

These are the diuers opinions of men vpon this matter: wherein if we desire to take a very short & sure way to attaine to the true cause, we must referre it to the wrath and iudgements of God, because that what causes forer the learned can inuent, the Eternall sheweth himselfe very powerfull, and to be feared therein, considering that he hath disposed all of them, and that they all depend vpon him alone. And surely this is a worke of the omnipotent worthie to be wondered at, and which may well cause men to moue and tremble before his maiestie. For if hee shewe himselfe terrible and fearefull by deluges of water, by haile, thunder, lightning, stormes and tempests, he doth no lesse by the motions and shakings of the earth, which are in regarde therof, as thunders are in the aire. For seeing that the earth is as the foot of the world, and that it is assigned to men for their habitation, whither is it that they may haue recourse, if it quake vnder them, and faile to sustaine them? Whither shall they retire, if hee will allow them no more dwelling in her: but will spue them out as the scripture saith? For if it be hard for them to flie before fire, and before water, and to finde harbour against windes, thunders, and tempests; whither shall they flie, if the earth will not receiue, nor beare them? And what dread may invade them, when sometimes it quaketh in sort that it openeth, and is swallowed vp, as into a bottomlesse pitte; as it came to passe, when it swallowed Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, and their families? Who will not be astonished when it riseth vp, overturning all, even the highest mountaines, and hardest rocks, and moueth it selfe in such sort, that it maketh houses and buildings dance like rammes and sheepe, that would one butte at another, wherewith many are vtterly destroyed.

ſtroied: as it happened in the year 1531. in the Realme of Portugall, which was ſo ſhaken by an earth-quake, that at Liſbone the chiefe citie thereof, there were ouertrown almoſt twelue hundred houſes, beſides a great number of others which were greatly ſpoiled. This horrible earthquake continued the ſpace of eight daies, and gaue very furious aſſaults ſiue or ſixe times a day. And in the time of the Emperour Tiberius, twelue cities in Aſia were quite ruinated in one night by an earth-quake. And Iosephus recordeth that by another thirtiethouſand Iewes died. So Iuſtine recounteth, that by another earthquake many cities were deſtroyed, and an hundred and ſeuentie thouſand perſons periſhed in the raigne of Tigranes in Armenia. What cauſes then ſoeuer there may be in nature of ſo many terrible euents; yet we muſt alwaies haue recourſe to the Author and Gouvernour thereof, without whom it can performe nothing: and he it is, that bringeth earth quakes out of his treaſures, as hee doth the winds; either by his commandement without a meanes; or by his miniſters ordayned thereto; or elſe by ſome power infuſed into things, the which may according to his good pleaſure diſplay it ſelfe in effect, to denounce his iudgements on men. For hee it is of whome the prophet ſpeaketh. [The earth trembled and ſhaked, and the foundations of the mountaines were mooued and quaked, and the foundations of heauen were bowed and trembled, becauſe he was angrie.] Wherefore we may very well conclude, that as God declareth his magnificence and wonderful glorie in heauen, which is aſſigned to be his ſeat (as his word teacheth vs, and as wee haue heretofore amply diſcourſed) ſo like- wiſe hee doth manifeſt it no leſſe in the earth: which is his footſtoole, when hee cauſeth it to ſhake and remooue, as if beeing ſupprised with ſome great and ſtrong feauer, it ſhooke and trembled before him. And therefore Iob alſo ſaith: [The Eternall is wiſe in heart and mightie in ſtrength; who hath benee fierce againſt him, and hath prospered? He remooueth mountaines, and they feele not when he ouertroweth them in his wrath. Hee remooueth the earth out of her place, that the pillars thereof do ſhake: the pillars of heauen tremble and quake at his reproofe.] But now let vs note, that all that, which wee haue here deliuered, diſprooueth not the earth to remaine alwaies firme and immoueable in it ſelfe, in ſo much as it mooueth not out of the place which was appointed to it by God, neither doth it ſwerue neuer ſo little: conſidering that the moouings and tremblings are not vniuerſall, but particular onely in ſome places, in ſuch ſort that the foundations thereof are not any whit altered. And if we conſider well of theſe things, the Earth will ſerue no leſſe for a preacher vnto vs, then the aire and the fire, yea then all heauen to denounce vnto vs the ſoueraigne maieltie of the Almighty, ruling aboue all his workes: as I hope to morrow, wee may haue goodly teſtimonies entreating of the water, which is diſperſed throughout the earth, and afterwards ſpeaking of the excellent commodities and precious riches, that theſe two elements doe yeeld to men, into which matter you (A S E A) ſhall enter with your diſcourſe.

Of the ſea, and of the waters, and of the diuiſion and diſtribution of them throughout the earth. Chap. 57.

A SER.

HE holy Scripture doth certifie vs, how that in the beginning the earth was covered ouer with water, and that it appeared not in any ſort, but onely vnder the forme a great deep til ſuch time as God commanded the waters to retire to the channels and places, which hee had prepared for their aboad. So that then the earth was diſcovered, even ſo much thereof, as was needefull for the habitation and nourishment of men and beaſts. But this ſoueraigne creator of the Vniuers would not haue the waters to bee gathered all into one place, and not to haue their their course through the earth, but providing for every commoditie for his creatures; hee ordained, that out of the great Ocean sea, which is as the great bodie of the waters, there should issue diuers armes and members, by meanes whereof we haue the Mediterran seas; out of which againe procede many other waters, as lakes, foulds, riuers, and brookes. For although that all these waters seeme to haue their springing out of certaine fountaines, which many affirme to bee made of the aire; yet the very truth is, that their chiefe source is out of the sea: which (as it is named in Iob) is as the wombe, out of which all waters, both celestiall and terrestriall haue their first originall, and doe engender and repaire themselves continually by the meanes that we haue already heard. Now according to the opinion of the Philosophers, all reason teacheth vs, that this ordinance in nature concerning the distribution of the waters throughout the earth, hath beene made of necessity for the mutual maintenance of these two elements: for so much as the Earth beeing naturally dry, cannot subsist without moisture: and contrariwise the flowing water, could not haue ought to stay vpon, without being propped by the earth. Wherefore it was necessary, that the earth should giue it place, and that it should open all her vaines and conduits, that the water might passe through the same, both within and vpon it, yea & to pierce euen to the highest mountaine tops: in which place being pressed with the waight of the earth, and also in some place moued by the aire, which driueth it, one shall see it issue out in great vehemency euen as it were squirted out.

Why the water is mixed with the earth

Whosoever then will consider of the whole circuit of the earth, shall learne that the moiety of the roundnesse thereof is enuironed by the sea, which floweth round about it, causing the waues thereof to goe and come continually, sometimes aloft, and sometimes very low: like as if this terrene globe were a bowle cast into the water, one part whereof should lye discovered out of it, and the other covered within it: Which water the Philosophers hold to bee entirely round, having the open heaven in every part ouer it. And this is confirmed by those droppes of water which fall vpon the ground, or vpon leaves of trees and of herbes which are round. If also one fill a vessell toppe brim full of water, they may evidently behold, that the water riseth & swelleth in the middell, making a kind of round forme. In truth, by reason that the water is subtile and soft, these things are far better comprehended by arguments and concluding reasons, wherewith the bookes of the learned are replenished, then by the view of the eie. Notwithstanding this is very admirable, that if one put neuer so little water into a vessell already brimfull, the vppermost part thereof will shedde ouer: and yet if one cast into the same so toppefull vessell, some heavy thing, yea to the waight of twenty pence, the water will not spill therefore, but will swell onely, till such time as it stand much aboue the brimme of the vessell, by the rising thereof. Moreouer the roundnesse of the water, which causeth this, doth also make that those which are in the top of a ship, do sooner discover land, then those which are in the fore deck, or in the sterne thereof, so likewise if any shiing thing be fastned to the top of the mast parting from the port, it seemeth that the vessell still goeth downewards till at length the sight of her will be cleane lost. Moreouer, how should it bee possible that the Ocean Sea, which enuironeth the earth, as being the mother sea, and the receptacle of all the rest, doth not runne abroad, considering there is no banke to withhold it, if it were not of round forme? Wherein this is to bee noted, that the water of the Sea doth in no sort overpasse the limits thereof, nor doth euerrunne but toward the place of the naturall situation thereof. Of which the Greeke Philosophers haue rendred an especiall reason by Geometrical propositions and conclusions making demonstration that this water cannot runne otherwise, what soome or scope soeuer it haue. For they say, that considering the nature of water is to fall alwaies downward; and that also the Sea stretcheth it selfe out so farre as it can; neuertheless according as the declining of the Sea can suffer, as every one may see with his eie: and by how much the lower it is, by so much the more it doth approach to the center of the earth: whereupon ensueth, that all lines drawne from that center to the waters nearest to it, are shorter then those lines, which are drawne from the vppermost waters to the extremitie of the sea: so that by that means, the water of the sea doth alwaies decline towards the center, from whence it can in no sort fall, but doth there retaine it selfe.

That the water is round.

Why the water doth retaine it selfe in it selfe, without running abroad.

Surely if we do neerely consider this marvellous work of God (the Sea & waters) we shall therein find goodly mirrors wherein to contemplate his maiestie and greatnes. According as he saith to his seruant Iob, [Who hath shut vp the Sea with doores when it issued and came forth forth, as out of the wombe? When I made the cloudes as a couering thereof, and darke-nesse as the swadling bands thereof? When I established my commaundement vpon it, and set barres and doores: And saide, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no farther; and heere shalt thou stay thy proud waves.] The like is also taught by the Psalmist, saying: [He ga-thereth the waters of the sea together, as vpon an heap, and layeth vp the depths in his treasures.] Which is as much as if he should say, (God holdeth backe the waters, as with a bridle, that they may not ouerrun and couer the earth.) Wherein we are moreover to note, that the holy Ghost speaketh concerning the sea, in this fore-alleged text of Iob, & in many other places of Scripture, as if it had some sense and vnderstanding, and that God had caused it to heare his voice, and had commaunded it, as hee commaundeth men to obey his ordinance, although it be a senselesse creature and without life: but this is to the end that we may better learne to acknowledge the power and prouidence of God ouer all his workes. For the sea is not onely deafe, and deprived of all sense, and much more without vnderstanding, but also exceeding furious and and outragious, beeing mooued by force of windes and tempests, in such sort that it often seemeth, as if it would ouerrunne and swallow vp all the earth with the waues thereof, and would rise with the floods therof and mount vp to heauen. For one may behold how at one time the waues wil swell and rise vp like high mountaines: and suddenly after will tumble and couch downe like vallies, and as if the sea would cleaue and diuide it selfe, and so discover the deepe bottome thereof. And therefore the kingly Prophet hauing diuinely described all things, together with the power that the soueraigne creator had to raise, and to appease such tempestes, he exhor-teth all men to acknowledge this infinite power of the Eternall, and those great works and wonders, which hee declareth in the sea: and to haue recourse for their deliverance out of all dangers, to the Creatour and true Lord of the waters, and of the windes, and of all nature.

 But yet wee must heere consider the obedience that the sea sheweth, even in the greatest furies thereof, to the commaundement which God hath deliuered to it from the first creation thereof. For although it be often mooued, as wee saide; yet doth it containe it selfe shutte vp within the boundes which were appointed vnto it by the ordinance of God, as if it were affraide to runne out, and durst not passe farther, as having heard and vnderstood that which the creator thereof had commanded, and had engrauen it in memory for euer. And therefore we may see, that after it hath swollen and risen aloft in waues, and that it hath menaced the earth, as if it would ouerflow it, & couer it againe with the deepe, as at the beginning: it is neuertheles arrested, and beaten backe to returne into the proper gulfes thereof, which are assigned for it to lodge in, euen by a very little sand only. For what is the sea shore, but sand only, which is a kinde of loose earth like the dust, & is easily driuen with the wind? And yet the word of God, which hath giuen commandement to the sea (which is so horrible & fearefull a creature being mooued, is of such power, that this small sand is sufficient to make it keepe within the confines and limits thereof, & to breake the furious waues thereof, as if he, who hath established this ordinance in nature, stood in preface vpon the shore side, to command it to do so, and that for feare and reue-rence of him, it returned to hide it selfe in the deepe: how much more then should his word and voice moue the hearts of men, breaking, eleauing, and pearcing them through, if they were not harder then stones, and rockes, and more senselesse then the waters? For this cause the Lord saith by Esay: [And to whom shall I haue respect, but to him that is afflicted, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my words?] And Ieremie shewing to the people of Israel the malice and rebellion, which was in them, against the Lord their God, doth giue them the Sea for a patterne, and referreth them to learne to obey their Creator, after the example thereof. Let vs learne then that the Sea and other waters doe not overpasse their bounds and limits; but when it pleaseth God that they should ouerflow to challice men, by deluges and floods: as it oftentimes commeth to passe through his iust iudgement. But it shall bee your office (ACHITO) to speake of this point, discoursing

Of the flowing and ebbing of the sea, and of the power that the moone hath ouer it and ouer all other inferi-our bodies. Chapter 58.

A M A N A.

IF we doe not referre all things to the heavenly disposition of him, who hath framed and compassed all with his hand, and doth governe all by his prudence and sustaineth all with his power: it will bee very difficult, yea impossible for vs, to declare the causes and reasons of his works in an humane discourse which are of such authority, that they may put a good spirit out of all scruple and doubt: Yea euen in the subiect which we intend now to entreate of, to witte, the flowing and ebbing of the sea. The searching out of which secret did so trouble a certaine great Philosopher (some say, Aristotle) that being vpon the shore Eubœa now called Negropont, onely so search out and to behold the naturall cause thereof, and not being able to enforme himselfe sufficiently therein, it did so vex him, that chaling at nature her selfe, and against the water, he cast himselfe into the sea, saying to it (sith I cannot comprehend thee, yet shalt thou haue the honour to comprehend mee, and keepe mee within thy gulfes) and indeede hee was heere swallowed by the deepe. And certes this ordinary ebbing and flowing of the ocean, according to which it goeth, commeth, spreadeth it selfe abroad, & then doth every day retire, without euer sayling in the order thereof, must needs bee a most wonderful thing. And that which is most admirable therein is, that the flowing and ebbing thereof doe follow the course of the moone. To which planet likewise is attributed with most apparant reason the cause of this flowing and ebbing, she being as the regient of the seas and waters, by the appointment of the soueraigne creatour, as is scene by experience and by the agreeableness of nature, which they haue together. For we must note, that as the moone encreaseth or waineth, so is it with the state of the flowing of the sea: And therefore although that it happen diuersly, yet the principall cause of the motion thereof resideth in his planet. For betweene the two times that she riseth, which is in fower and twenty howers, wherein she compasseth the whole earth, the sea doth twise flow, & doth as oftentimes ebbe. And when the moone beginneth to mount in the east, then doth the flood rise, and the sea swell, till such time as this planet doth attaine to our right meridian, which is in the mid heauen, and that it begin to decline towards the west, at which time the water ebbeth. Yet neuertheles all those sixe howers, wherein the moone maketh her course towards the line of mid night opposite to our noone line, the flood returneth and encreaseth, till after it hath passed that line, and then it doth ebbe againe, till such time as the said regient thereof the moone returne againe aboue our Horizon. It is most certen that the flood doth neuer returne iust at that very houre and instant, wherein it flowed the day before. But this doth proceed likewise from the course of the Moone, which seruing for these base and inferiour things, and not rising every day at one selfe same instant, thee doth drawe the course of the sea with her: in such sort, that the tide is more late, and of shorter continuance at one time then at another, and yet doth not the distance of time betweene the tides change one whit, for it endureth lixe houres in ebbe, and so long time in flowing. But here we meane not all manner of howres as our common howres are, according to the different situation of places, but wee meane equall and equinoctiall houres by consideration whereof the ebbing and flowing of the sea will bee found alwaies of like time, as is abouesaid. Moreouer, from seven daies to seven daies, the flowing is found different by the same power of the Moone: for it is but very small the first quarter thereof, and till it be halfe round. In the second quarter it alwaies encreaseth till full Moone: at which time the sea is at her greatest height. From thence forward the flood decreaseth: so that the third quarter it is in the same state wherein it was the first quarter. Neuerthelesse when the waining Moone is halfe round, the flood beginneth to rise. But when shee is in conjunction with the Sunne, the tide riseth as high as at full Moone. And when the Moone is high and Septentrionall, the tide is not so vehement as when shee is Meridionall, because that being then more neere to the earth, shee doth the more exercise her power.

Ocean sea doe reach farther, then those of the other Mediterranean seas : wherein the eb- bings and flowings doe not appeare as in the Ocean. Which may bee said to proceede, because that a thing which is entire hath more power, then any part which is separated. Also the high sea retaineth in it selfe more of the power of the Moone, which worketh vpon it at ease and pleasure, beyond all comparison more forcibly then vpon other seas, which are narrower, and minister lesse meanes to this planet to exercise her rule therein. From whence it commeth to passe, that lakes and rivers doe neuer flow. And for the Mediterranean seas they are enclosed about with the earth, as in an heauen, though there bee some places, or some armes of the same seas very broad. Some likewise are very much subiect to the Moone, as the Adriaticke gulfe, wherein Venice is builded, which ebbeth and floweth twice every day like the Ocean. And it is to bee noted, that such motions are better perceiued on the shoare and sea coastes, then in the middest thereof : euen as the pulse of the arterie is better knowne in the extreames of the body, then in the bulke thereof. Some also doe render this cause of the flowing, and ebbing of the see, to wit, that though the waters thereof be salt, yet were not this sufficient for their conversation, no more then of their neighbour the aire, if they had not a continuall motion. For we see, that sea water doth presently corrupt being in a vessell, and not mooued. Many also haue noted that in every revolution or course of the moone, the tyde relecth for three daies long, to witte, the seuen, eight and ninth day thereof : and that when shee is at full, all seas doe purge themselves by scummes. Certainly it is wondrous to see what power this planet hath, not onely over the waters, but also over the earth, and over all liuing creatures. Which hath ministred occasion to many Philosophers to suppose, that the moone was that quickning spirit, which nourisheth the earth; and that also by her inconstant course approaching diuers waies to the inferiour bodies, she produced diuers effects, sometimes replenishing them and sometimes leauing them void and empty. Whereof it commeth, that all fishes having scales and shels, doe encrease and decrease according to the course of the moone : and that all liuing creatures also, which haue blood, doe feeble themselves refreshed, when she reneweth. It is likewise supposed, that the blood augmenteth or diminisheth in man, according as the moone encreaseth, or waineth : yea that herbes and trees doe partake of her power. Aristotle also doth note, that those creatures which are ready to die, do die onely when the sea ebbeth. But in this matter, as in all things which doe concerne ebbing and flowing of the Ocean, we must euer haue recourse to the ordinance that the Eternall father of the vniuers hath established in all his creatures : according to which they perseuer in obedience to their creatour, without transgressing one tittle of his lawes : as we haue a notable example in the sea, and in the waters, which containe themselves in such admirable sort (as in our former speech is declared) within their bounds and limits. And if at any time they ouerflowe (as whilome happened in Holland, where the water brake through the dams and banks, wherewith the country is bounded, swallowing vp the coast towns, with an incredible losse of men and riches : as also at the same time. Tiber did so ouerflowe at Rome, that it rose in the fields the height of a lance, ruinating in fower & twety howers many bridges & stately edifices, the endommagement whereof, comprising therein the moueable goods lost, was esteemed to amount to the value of three millions of gold : there being about three thousand persons choaked and drowned.) Such deluges, I say, doe not come to passe (what naturall causes soeuer the learned forcethemselues to render) without the expresse command and ordinance of God, who will after this sort vse the water, to take vengeance vpon those whom hee pleaseth to wash from off the face of the earth, as being vnworthy to dwell longer thereupon. And so he himselfe hath prophesied vnto vs, saying : [There shall be signes in the Sunne, and in the Moone, and in the Starres, and vpon the earth, trouble among the nations, with perplexitie : the sea and waters shall roare.] Adding afterwards, [For the powers of heauen shall be shaken.] Moreover we may say, that although the celestially bodies haue no more life, sense and vnderstanding, then the earth and the sea : yet neuertheless they haue, as it were, a secret feeling by nature of the maiestie of God their creator, who causeth them to rise vp against men for their rebellion and wickednesse. Surely when we see them rise and stand vp against men, to worke them euill in stead of doing them good, contrarie to the end of their first creation ; wee must consider of them, as if they enuied & denied to serue men any more, which turne disloyall, ingratefull & peruerse towards him, from whom their totall good proceedeth : As the Sunne did witnesse when it waxed darke at the death of our Redeemer, depriuing those of his light, which were risen against vp against the eternall Son of God, that had created them. For it is certaine, that the creatures doe groane and trauell altogether (as the Scripture saith) till such time as Iesus Christ shall come in iudgement, which is the day of the restitution and restoring of all things, foretold by the Prophets. And which day being neere, it is no marvell: if God doe daily shew his particular iudgements vpon men, to put them in mind of this generall and vniuersall iudgement, whereto heauen, earth, the sea, and all creatures shall come together: and therefore also he giueth them so many signes of his wrath, by thunders, tempests, deluges, and inundations of water, as we haue made mention. But let vs proceed to contemplate his other works and great wonders, which abound euery where, both in the earth, and in the sea, and in other terrestriall waters: by which very many commodities, do redound to men through the prouidence of God. And first we will speake of the diuersity of waters. Which (A R A M) I would haue you to discourse of.

in them. Chapter 59.*

A R A M. According to the nature of the most wonderfull workes of God, in all that, which hee hath created, the maruels are innumerable, which may bee considered in the sea, and in all the waters which proceede out of it, and returne in to it, without any increasing or diminishing in it selfe, as we haue already heard. And if there were no other thing, but that the waters of the sea are alwaies salt, and other waters are for the most part fresh, would not that bee sufficient to teach vs to acknowledge the great power, wisdom, and bounty of the creatour, and how puissant hee is in all his workes? For though that all waters are of one nature, as making vp one onely element? yet doth hee make them of diuers qualities, according as hee knoweth how to purifie, distill and purge, or else to mingle and mixe them, with his other creatures. Whereupon it falleth out, that wee haue not onely salt waters in the sea, but that there are some found also in fountaines, yea oftentimes very neere to other springs of fresh water: Wherein the prouidence of God declareth it selfe to bee very great. For if all the waters were salt, men and beasts could not liue, nor the earth fructifie, and nourish the fruites thereof, because that liuing creatures cannot want fresh water, whether it bee for their drinke, or for their other necessary commodities: neither is salt water fitte to water the earth, considering that salt makes it barren. On the other side, if al waters were fresh, where might men find salt enough to suffice them, for the necessary commodities of their life? For although that there bee some salt mines, and some salt ground, as appeareth by the salt waters of fountaines, which passe through such grounds: yet the best meanes to haue good salt and in abundance is by the waters, and chiefly by Seawater. What may wee say also of so many sorts of water, whereof some participate with Sulphure; some with allom; other with iron or brasie, or with other mettals or minerals, which doe heate some of them in such sort, as men make naturall bathes of them, hauing diuers vertues and powers which serue for medicines in many kindes of diseases?

Of the diuers qualities of water, and of the prouidence of God therein

Now the Philosophers doe much straine themselves to declare the causes of so many marvellous effects. For some say that the sunne, which is the greatest of all planets, drying vp by his heate the moisture of the water, and burning and sucking vp all the humiditie of the earth, doth by this decoction cause the Sea to become salt, because the force of the solarie fire doth attract vnto it the most fresh and subtile part of the water, making the more heauie and thicke part that remaineth, to be saltier and of more substance: whereof it cometh, that the water towards the sea bottome is fresher, then that which is aboue. Others alledge three efficientes, which both cause and continue the saltneesse: to wit, the heate of the Sunne, for the foresaid reasons; and also because it maketh the water to purifie: then the continuall agitation thereof by flowing and ebbing, which causeth that the Sea neither resteth nor runneth a direct course: and thirdly, the ordinary receiuing of raine. For they say, that when salt resteth in the water, it descendeth downwards by reason of the waight thereof: and when the water runneth, it is purified by the earth: and that all rainewater, because it is heated by the Sunne, and doth putrifie through tardation and slownes, is somewhat brackish. But they are much more troubled when they entreate of fountaines. For some say, that the sea yeeldeth none but salt waters, as is seene by many waters neere it: And that those which are fresh, become so by a long and vehement course. Others maintaine that they be engendred by the aire. Now experience manifesteth, that their saltnesse is diminished by the length and continuance of the course of the water. For the farther that welles are from the sea, the more fresh they are: because the water doth more purge it selfe, by the earth ouer which it transuerseth, leauing a part of the force thereof, and sometimes all of it, in the slime, and in the sand. And heere wee may note, that waters, especially Well waters, which doe all come from some springs, doe seeme to be hotter in winter then in sommer, although they doe neuer change their nature: for this proceedeth of the aire, which is colde in winter and hotte in summer. Through the opposition then of these things one selfe same water seemeth to receiue diuers qualities: enen as we see, that according to the disposition of our body, the qualitie of the aire, which enuironeth vs, is esteemed. For when we are hotte, we doe suppose, that which we touch to be cold; and when we be cold, we esteeme that which we touch to be otherwise. Wherefore we must iudge enen so of the inner parts of the earth, esteeming them to be simply neither hotter nor colder in one season more then in another, but onely in respect of the aire. Indeepe water doth waxe a little warme, when through the coldnesse of the aire, the heate is constrained to retire it selfe downward in such sort as it cannot issue nor spreade it selfe vpon the earth: and therefore the snowe which doth lye a long vpon it, doth commonly make it more fertile; for it retayneth the heat in the bowels thereof. Moreover, the vppermost part of the earth, which the water may come to, is of a clammy slime of the nature of brimstone or of salt, or of mettall: which causeth that the exhalations enclosed in this part doe heat the water. And therefore such waters are either odoriferous, or of a badde smell, or without any saueur, of which qualities one may easily iudge by the smell and taste. For some waters saueur not onely of lime, or of salt, but they doe also boile, as in the bathes neere to Padua; yea such waters are very ordinary, so that there are few regions, but haue some of them. But they are most common in Germany and in Italy. And the cause that they so boile is, either fire or putrefaction, or else naturall or celestially heate. But for the celestially heate, it seemeth that it cannot be so great, especially in winter and in the night time, that it should heate the water very much. And for naturall heat, it is neuer actuall but in liuing creatures, because they haue life and sense. Neither is putrified heate so powerfull, that it can make water to boile, neither is it very likely, that the substance of any thing may be engendred and corrupted at one instant. It resteth then, that the cause should rather be in the fire: considering also, that heate hath but little motion, except it attaineth to the height thereof, whereas otherwise it doth quench it selfe. And therefore it is that matter which burneth vnder the earth, that ministreth this puissant heate, which doth so warme the water. And wee may moreover note, that all those waters which boile so, are naturally light, and haue some medicinable faculty and property: And yet they are not to be so much accounted of, as that which is fitte for common vsage in mens affaires to preferue health. For good water hath neither colour, smell, nor saueur, and is passing cleere: and being drunke it abideth not long in the belly: such (they say) is the water of the riuer Euleus, which falleth from the mountaine Zager by Susiana, whereof the Kings of Persia did make prouision in their expeditions and warlike voyages. For to the preferuation of health, water is no lesse to be carefully chosen, then aire. Now as warme waters are famous for the reason heretofore deliuered; so there are some waters also very much admired for their great coldnesse, whereof snowe, marble, mettals, cold aire, sudden motion, and the great fall from aloft, (euerie one in his degree) may be the cause. Againe, the saueurs or tastes of waters are very diuers, and the principall cause thereof is heate. For sodden earth (which is of sundry sorts) giueth a taste to water, according to the qualitie thereof. And the like reason is concerning colours; for fine and thinne clay doth cause the colour of waters: but thicke clay tarrieth not in water, and therefore dieth it not. The same cause is also in the difference of smells. And alwaies waters that are of a good smell, are profitable for creatures: but stinking waters cause diseases: for (as Philosophers say) contrary causes appertaine to contrarie things. Good water likewise is lightest, as that which flecteth aboue other water, be it in riuers, springs, or welles. From whence it commeth that fresh water floateth vpon sea water: which likewise being more massiue and waightie, beareth more heauie burdens. And amongst fresh waters, the water of Rhodanus or Rosne (in France) swimmeth vpon that of the the

the lake of Geneva, passing over the midst thereof. Also many properties and great wonders are written concerning waters, with the causes of them: as that, which is reported by Iosephus, of a certaine flood in Iudea neere Syria, which ranne every day, except vpon the Sabbath day: which was reputed a matter religious, and as a myracle: although that this might happen and come to passe through a naturall cause, if wee will so argue, to wit, that no water was gathered into this flood by orderly spaces, then was sufficient to runne for sixe daies and not for the seuenth: in such sort as Phisitions render a like cause concerning the renewings or fits, and ceasings of feavers. For the world is the great man, as man is the little world. But not stretching this discourse any farther, wee will onelie note for conclusion thereof, that in the diuersitie of the kindes of waters, that which is gathered together in one place and is salt, is called the sea; the fresh water so gathered together is called a lake; and if it moouenot at all, it is named a marish or fen: but if it be somewhat deepe, it is a standing poole; and if it runne, then is it a river: if it gather through raines, or by snowe, then is it a torrent, or raine flood: and if it spring, it is a fountaine; which is euer the best water, and doth slowliest putrefie. For it is least moist, and is most concocted by the heauenly heat. Also the lightest water doth hardliest corrupt: for which cause it is most fit for the maintenance of mans life, as approaching neere to the substance of the aire by which wee breath. Wee haue saide enough then concerning this matter. But me thinketh that our succeeding discourse requireth that wee should entreat of those commodities, which men receiue by waters through navigation, which (ACHITO) shall be the subiect of your discourse.

Of the diuers appellations of waters.

Of the commodities which men reape of the waters, by navigation, and of the directions which seamen receiue from heauen, and from the starres vpon the sea. Chapter 60.

ACHITO. Amongst such things as are worthy of consideration in the sea, and in other waters, wee must not passe over in silence those goodly commodities and great profits which they bring vnto men, by the meanes of navigations, and of the dealings and trafficks which they exercise by them. For it is to bee noted, that euery land and countrey cannot bee furnished with all commodities, because God hath so disposed thereof, that some abound in those thinges which other some doe greatly want and stand in neede of. But by meanes of sayling by water, all that which can bee required may be transported from one countrey to another, with very small trouble and charges: so that one nation may communicate those commodities with another, which the creator hath particularly bestowed on them all, each graunting mutuall helpe to the other by this meanes. Wherein surely we may acknowledge the providence of God to be very great and manifold. For first the Lord hath disposed of his creatures, and distributed his treasures according to the diuersity of lands & countries, even in such maner as he diuideth his gifts and graces amongst men. For he bestoweth not all either vpon one or vpon two, or vpon three, or vpon any other certaine number of them: And therefore there neuer hath bene, nor shall be any one, which either could or may surpasse all others so much, that hee may haue no neede of another, or that hath sufficient for himselfe. For if one man possessed all, hee would thinke himselfe to bee no more a man, but a God rather, and would therefore contemne all others. Moreover, it is most certaine, that if euery one were so well furnished with all things that they might all surpasse one another, there would be no humane societie. For one would make no account of another: being all puffed vp with pride (where with they are naturally enclined) there would arise a thousand quarrels and dissensions amongst them, as wee ordinarily see to happen amongst the proud, mighty, puissant, and rich. Forseeing that charitie, which should dwell amongst men, can take no place; how could they be vnited and allied together in amitie, if they were not constrained thereto through necessitie? and if it bee a difficult matter to conioine and maintaine them in peace and mutuall good will, what neede soeuer they haue one of another, one may easily iudge what would ensue, if they had not necessitie for their mistresse to this effect, tion that

which causeth them to do in spight of all their abilities, that which shew cannot obtaine of them, but by force. Againe how could men exercise the workes of charitie amongst themselves, (which workes are very much commended vnto them by God, to be done towards their neighbours) if every one could at his pleasure excell his companion? As then God hath placed and disposed sundry members in one bodie, and yet hath not appointed them one selfe same office, but to every on his owne: so hath it pleased him to diuide and distribute his goodnes, gifts, and graces amongst men, to the end that they may one serue another, as members of one and the same bodie, which cannot consist without the recipocall helpe of all. So likewise hath he established the sundry regions of the earth, enriching every one of them with certaine particular commodities, which do often constraîne men to helpe and succour one another, and to liue in peace: without which, they would like madde beasts ouer runne and destroy each other, as wee (wretches) doe finde true, especially in time of warre. But wee may well note vpon this point, that although the most mightie do by their hate, enmities, dissensions, reuengements and warres, contend oftentimes with all their power, to stop and hinder the trafficke, dealings, and transportations of merchandize from one countrey, and out of one place to another, especially of foode and victuals; yet whatsoever they may or can doe (bee they kings, princes or Emperors) they cannot for all that make such a stoppe, but that they will alwaies passe and scape by some meanes, maugre all their powers. Wherein wee must acknowledge, that seeing God hath ordained, that those which beare his image, should haue communication one with another, for the causes aforesaid, and that chiefly by the aide of nauigation: it is a great presumption in mighty men to oppose themselves against the order of the Omnipotent, and against that communion of benefits, which hee will haue to be maintained amongst men. Whome hee can constraîne to obserue his ordinances, euen through their owne couetousnesse, when their charitie faileth, making them to despise all dangers, that they may supply where neede is, though they bee forbidden vpon paine of death. For such restraint by commandement is so farre from hindering their couetousnesse, that it doth more inflame it, because they expect greater gaine, then if there were mutuall libertie, and therefore they cause more warre secretly to passe, and by that meanes they put all to hazard: yea they would rather open away vnder ground (like moles) or else would flie in the aire (like birds) then leaue such trading: so wonderfull is God in all his workes, and in the government of all nature. For when hee pleaseth, hee serueth his owne torne with the affections and euill workes of men, yea drawing good out of their euill, euen against their owne wils. And therefore wee may very well affirme, that seeing God will haue men to trafficke together; it cannot choose, howsoeuer they enterprize to the contrarie, but that this order must be continued. For this cause likewise it was not the will of the creator, that the waters should so gather themselves into one place that they might not runne through the earth: but hee ordained, that out of the great Ocean (which is like the great bodie of the waters, and like the wombe, out of which they doe all first spring, and wherein they are engendred, and whereby they are repaired for euer) there should issue diuers armes and members, by meanes whereof wee haue the Mediterranean seas, lakes, floods, riuers and brookes. So also in this distribution, and by the meanes of nauigation, God hath giuen vs many other meanes; to the end we might behold with our eies, many testimonies of his prouidence engrauen in euery part of the vniuers, by the disposition of the workes of his almightie hand, as they who saile vpon the waters are constrained to acknowledge. For as hee hath appointed the watric element, to serue men to navigate therein; so hath he established the heauen, and ordeined the starres enchaufed therein, to direct them to the midst of the great gulfes and deepes of the sea. For when the ships are entred very farre into it, they that be therein doe cleane lose the sight of land; so that they cannot iudge by the consideration thereof, in what place they are, nor vpon what side, neither to what place they may bend their course to finde a conuenient port, but they must take their directions from heauen.

And for this cause also, though that the heauen be in perpetuall motion, and that all the planets and starres doe follow it, rising and setting in such sort, as they doe not alwaies appeare to men: yet there are some of another condition. For neere to the place, which Astronomers take for the pole, there are certaine starres which haue their motion and course so disposed, that they are alwaies seene at sea, being never hidden like the rest: and among these that is one, which is called the Polestarre, which is neuer seene to remooue (except a very

avery little) out of one place : so that it seemeth the whole heaven turneth about this star: As also we maintaine, that it hath the like place correspondent therto directly ouer against it in the other part of heaven, with a like appellation of name (as wee haue heretofore declared in our discourses concerning the celestiaall bodies) excepting the difference, which is put betweene these two poles, taken from their opposite situation in heaven, and from the starres, which are next vnto them; which also haue their course and motion like the rest: but doe onely differ in this, that rising and setting are not attributed vnto them, because they may be alwaies seene, when the spheres are discerned. For when the skie is covered with clouds, marriners doe finde themselves very much hindered and troubled. For then they prooue that which Iob saith concerning the workes of God, to wit, that he com-mandeth the sunne, and it riseth not, and he closeth vp the starres, as vnder a signet. And that hee maketh the starre Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the Climates of the south, doing great things and vnsearchable, yea marvellous things without number. Whereupon wee may note, that here is especiall mention made of the septentrionall starres, as well because that they are more seene then the rest, as also because it is their proprietie to bring and to procure raine and tempests (if wee may credite Astrologers) which cause that the heaven cannot bee seene. And because that some of these starres are so disposed, that they seeme to represent the figure of a chariot with fower wheelles, and they are very much glistering aboue other, they are commonly called by the name of Charles-waine: because also they have three other very bright stars neere to them, placed in such order as if they were cart-horses or oxen. Indeeede some haue called them the Beare, seeing them so conioyned together, taking the fower quarters apart as if they were the fower quarters of a Beare, and the other three as the taile thereof. There are some also, who haue named them the Dragon or Serpent, because that beeing considered together they might seeme to represent some such forme. But howsoever, it is certaine that pilots of gallies and ships doe direct & guide themselves chiefly by these northren starres, as beeing most seene, and best knowne by men, and because they doe almost alwaies remaine in one place, like the pole, or else doe mooue so little, that they are neuer out of sight, especially that constellation which is properly designed by name of the Beare, and is called the greater Beare in comparison of a lesse called the lesser Beare. And for which cause also the pole, which is in this region and part of heaven is called Arcticke, which is to say, of the Beare: for (Arctos) in Greeke signifieth a Beare. Now hereby wee farther learne, that it is very requisite for marriners, and chiefly for masters and gouernours of gallies and ships, to be Astronomers, at leastwise so much as to know the foresaid starres, and to know how to iudge of the elevation of the pole, and of the degrees, and the distances of euery land and country, according to the elevation. For it is by it, that not onely marriners, but Geometricians and Geographers also doe take their measures, and dimentions to part and measure out the earth. But wee haue staied long ynough in this matter, now we will consider how God hath diuided and limited out this terrestriall globe, and the sundry countries and regions that are therein, by the sea and separation of the water: as (A S E R) you can discourse vnto vs.

turneth towards the North, and is called the Caspian or Hircanian Sea: the second and third is that of Arabia, and the gulfes of Ormuz or the Persian sea, turning towards the South: and the fourth being greatest of all the rest is that whereinto the Ocean entreth at the streight of Gibraltar, which some call the pillars of Hercules; which gulfes by the name of the Mediterran, or Middle earth-sea, because it is compassed round about with land. And the same Mediterran sea runneth, enlarging it selfe, and making many bayes and gulphes, sometimes washing the coast of Europe; and sometimes that of Africa; and so it extendeth toward the East, and receiveth diuers names according to the places through which it passeth. For the first coast by which it runneth is called Mauritania Tingitana, which is that of Tremissen; then doth it take the name of Mauritania Cæsariensis, towards Algier, and Tunis; then is it named the Africke-sea towards Tripoly in Barbary; then passing the quicke lands it is the Lybian sea; and entring vpon the Marmarica and Cyrenaica, it glideth with that name till it water Egypt, and then it is said to bee the Egyptian sea. And all this coast is from the east to the west, till you arrive at the gulf of Larissa beyond Damietta, and at the vttermost of the deserts of the south-east, where Asia and Africa do separate. From which port being in Palestina, you must turne north and north-east, as if you would take your course by the west: and then this sea which was called the Syriack sea because of all Syria to Tripolis, changeth name, and is called the Egean sea, till you come to Gallipolis, or Helespont, making all this way diuers baies and gulfs: and vnder this name it coasteth Thracia, and the lands which abutte vpon Macedonia, and Morea, till you come to Albania, and there it beginneth to bee called the Adriaticke sea: then doubling towards the south, it floweth by the countrey of Calabria to the towne of Rhegium, vnder the name of the Ionicke sea, and passing betweene Sicilie and Italy, in stead of the old name Charybdis, it is called the Tyrrhene sea, and from thence it runneth towards the coast of Genoa, by name of the Ligusticke sea, which diuideth and separateth France from Italy, being nominated the French sea: then to end the course, and finish the compasse, it approbeth the isles of Maiorca and Minorca, being called the Balearicke sea. And proceeding farther, it runneth to the streight of Barbarie, bearing name the Iberian sea, where it returneth to the first point, from whence we said it first parted, to wit, at the streight of Gibraltar, which is the entrance of one sea into another.

Things to be considered of, by the diuision of lands by the waters. Acts 17.

Now in this brieue discourse, vpon which Cosmographers haue written many great volumes, we haue very goodly matter to consider vpon, not without much wonder of the providence of God; in that it hath pleased him to diuide, part, and limit out the earth, and the sundry countries and nations that are therein, by the sea, and by the bosomes, gulfs, and armes thereof. For it is written [God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath assigned the times which were ordained before, and the bounds of their habitation.] Which is as much to say, that as men haue not made nor created themselues, but haue bin created by the Eternall; so are they borne where hee pleaseth, hauing assigned them a place vpon the earth, not at their choise but at his pleasure.

And therefore also he establisheth their habitation, or changeth it, according to his good will, either keeping them within the countrey in which they were borne, or else driving them out, & bringing them into strange lands, as we haue verie eident examples throughout all the holy Historie, where mention is made of the children of Israel. For though the Scripture doth deliuer vs no testimony of the providence of God so special towards other nations, as it assureth vs to haue beene towards the people of Israel: yet we must neuertheless beleue, that there is not one man that dwelleth vpon the earth, to whome the Lord hath not by his providence assigned the place of his habitation: But hee would giue an example and more certaintie in his people, of that which he ordinarily doth towards all nations, although hee doth it not so openly, nor with so great fauour and grace, as is declared in those whom he accounteth for his children. And therefore the Prophet saith, [That it is God, who changeth the times and seasons, hee taketh away Kings, hee setteth vp Kings: because he giueth and taketh away kingdomes, and he augmenteth, cutteth off, and altereth the limits of them as he pleaseth.] Whereby wee also learne, that wee must not attribute either to the prudence and wisdom of any one, or yet to the force and power, or to the weapons or armies of men, the changes which wee daily see in the state of the most mighty: but to the onely ordinance and disposition of God, by which such alterations come to passe, according as the soueraigne iudge knoweth to be expedient and iust for the chastisement and punishing of men by one another, or else to shew himselfe benigne and fauourable towards them. For which cause the Scripture saith, that the Lord vsing as his instrument Senacherib the tyrant of Assyria to chastise many people and nations; he calleth him the rodde and scourge of his wrath: and doth greatly reprobend him by Isay, for that he attributed to himselfe the glory of those victories which he had given him, not because of his vertues (considering hee was a fierce and cruell King) but because God would vse him against those who deserved to bee chastised by the hands of such a tyrant and murderer. If then wee consider (as behoueth vs) vpon that

which wee haue here summarily touched, wee shall finde therein excellent doctrine for all kings, princes, and people, and for all men, as well in generall, as in particular: to the end to induce them, that they may containe themselves within the inclosure of thole confines wherein God hath placed them. For as hee is cursed in the lawe, which passeth the bounds of his neighbours possession; so must wee not doubt, but that they are subiect to the same curse, who cannot containe themselves within the bounds of those countries, in which God hath confined them, bestowing vpon them power, signories, and habitation therein. For from whence proceede the greatest dissensions and cruell wars, but from the ambition and auarice of men, which will one vsurpe aboue another, that which appertaineth not vnto them, and by such meanes doe outpasse their limits? whereas if every one would content himselfe with that part and portion of land, which the creator thereof hath bestowed vpon him, who doubteth, but that men should liue in much more peace? As then God through his prouidence would constrain them by necessity and neede which they haue one of another, to trafficke and communicate together in liberty and mutuall securitie, by that meanes to receiue out of one countrie into another those things which faile therein, and abound elsewhere, and for the causes by vs heretofore deliuered: so it hath pleased him to set mightie and strong bounds and limits against their ambition and auarice, especially of kings, princes, and great men. For wee see how hee hath diuided and separated one countrey from another, and the diuers regions and kingdoms of the earth not onely by meanes of seas, lakes, and great rivers, but also by craggie, high, and vnpassable mountaines, which (as the kingly prophet witnesseth) hee hath established by his power, that by this meanes men might bee confined within the bounds of the habitation assigned by the Eternall to every people, in such sort as hee hath inclosed the waters within their places, to the course which he hath ordained them, hauing bounded them with hills & rocks. And yet there are no bounds so difficult to passe, which may bridle and restrain the ambition and insatiable desire of men within any limits, but that they will passe over the deepest, the longest, the amplest, and broadest waters, and the highest and steepest mountaines in the world: so that there are no places so inaccessible, through which they will not cutte a passage, one to ouerrunne another by great outrage and violence. Wherein surely they evidently declare, that they are much more furious then the sea, how outrageous and rough soeuer it be; seeing they can in no wise containe themselves within their limits, as the waters doe: which also maketh them more vnreasonable then brute beasts. For although there bee many vnruly and furious horses in one stable, yet each of them will commonly be stayed with an halter made but of a little coard or leather, and will be kept a by little barre of wood, from striking and running ouer one another; so that one onely stable will serue them all. But men doe to the contrarie shew themselves to bee such furious and contentious beasts, that the whole world cannot suffice them. For there is neither riuer, sea, lake, nor mountaine, which can bee a barre sufficient to withhold them from forcing and rauaging one another, destroying themselves by horrible massacres and cruell warres. Which no doubt commeth vnto them especially through want of acknowledging and considering vpon the prouidence of God, by which hee hath appointed bounds to their habitation, ambition, and auarice, as wee haue said, and for that they will not containe themselves within them, obeying the ordinance of their creator. But we haue said ynough concerning this subiect. Let vs now discourse vpon those commodities which come to men & to all creatures, by the course of the waters through the earth. Which (A M A N A.) shall be the substance of your speech.

Of the commodities which are incident to men, and to all creatures, by the course of waters through the earth. Chap. 62.

A M A N A. IF men doe but slenderly acknowledge the prouidence of God in the limits of their habitation which he hath appointed, as well by means of mountaines as by waters (as we haue heard in the precedent speech :) they do also make but small stay in the consideration of those great commodities, which he giueth and sendeth continually to them by meanes of them, and of all the earth. For as hee watereth this fruitfull mother by dewe and raine from heauen, as hath bene heretofore expressed: so doth he moiwaters, and of the vaines which are in the body.

Then it by meanes of fountaines, floods and riuers, which doe runne through it. Whereupon we must note, that the life of all corporall creatures doth principally consist in heat, & that this heat cannot be preserved & maintained without moisture, whereby it is nourished: euen as the flame of the snuffe, or match of a candle or lampe is nourished and maintained by the fat and humor which is therein. Therefore as God hath placed the sunne in heaven like a great fountaine of heate, and a great fornace of fire for to be distributed and disposed into all parts of the world: so that he established the sea here belowe in the earth, as a great and perpetuall fountaine convenient for the nourishment and conseruation of this heat, which is communicated to the earth, and to all the creatures that are therein. And therefore also this sea spreadeth it selfe into diuers places, by the meanes which haue bene declared: so that the courses of the waters in the earth are like the vaines in a mans body. For euen as the soueraigne Creator hath placed the liuer in the bodies of liuing creatures, which is as the fountaine of blood needfull for all the bodie to giue life thereto: and then hath made vaines like riuers to disperse and distribute this blood to every member, disposing them in such sort, as there is not any part but doth by meanes of these vaines receiue as much blood, as is needfull for the nourishment and preservation of the life thereof: so likewise he hath ordained heere below in earth, the sea and springs of waters, which bee afterwards disposeth into every place by meanes of fountaines, floods and riuers, who are as the vaines through which the water, that is as the blood of the earth, is conueyed and communicated, that it may bee moistened to nourish all manner of fruites, which God hath commaunded it to beare for the nurture both of men and beasts. Wherefore as in one bodie there are many veines, some greater, larger, and longer; and some lesser, narrower, and shorter, which neuertheless do all answer to one self same source and fountaine, and then doe diuide themselves into sundrie branches: so the earth hath her floods, riuers and streames, some great, other small, which haue all their common springs, and doe oftentimes ioine themselves together, or diuide themselves into diuers branches and armes, in such sort as the earth is moistened by them, so much as is needfull in euery part thereof. Moreouer, as it is watred to nourish the fruits; so men and other liuing creatures do thereby receiue their beuerage necessarie for the preservation of their life.

Of pleasure mixed with profit in the workes of God.

But amongst all these things we are to consider, that God the most good hath not onely provided by meanes of them for the necessities of his creatures, but enen for their honest pleasures, so that it hath pleased him to conioyne an excellent beautie with profit and vtilitie. For how goodly a thing is it to behold the fruitfull islands in midst of the sea, the cleere and sweete bubling springs, and gentle riuers and floods issuing out of rocks and caues of the earth, which tumble down the mountaines, flowe thorough the vallies, and glide along the plaines, through Forrests, fields and medowes, beeing decked with many fundry kinds of branched trees, that are planted aside from inhabitants, in midst of which, infinite litle birdes flie vp and downe tuning their voices to sing in sweete melody, and naturall musick? What vspeakeable pleasure befallerh to all creatures, especially to man, to liue amongst such abounding beauties? And who will not also admire the great variety which is in the disposition and distinction that wee behold in the earth, by the mountaines, rockes, vallies, plaines, fields, vineyards, meddowes, woods, and Forrests: especially if we consider the fruits and profits, which redound to men thereby, besides the gallant diuersity of infinite delectable pastures, beautified in all sorts? For there is not one foote of earth, which may not bee said to serue to some good vse; no not in most desert places. Some places are fit for fields, and Champion grounds; others for pastures; some for vineyards; other for fruitfull Orchards; and others for high and well growne trees fit for building timber, or for fire wood, to the end that men may helpe themselves therewith in all their needfull vses for firing. Some places also are particularly commodious for cattell to graze in, by which great gaine & pleasure is receiued. And for deserts, mountaines and Forrests, they are the proper retiring places for wilde beasts, by which likewise men do not onely receiue profit, but very great delectation also, and healthfull exercise in hunting of them: and which is more, such places are very commodious for household cattell, which doe there feede in euery place to marvellous profit. But let vs note, that all these properties and profits should not be found in the earth, if it were not conioyned with the water by the course thereof through euery part of it. Which water likewise doth cause many and vspeakeable profits, that redound to men by fish, which remaine not onely in the sea,

but also in lakes, ponds and riuers, being of so sundry kindes and natures, that it is not possible to number them. In which if the prouidence of God be most admirable, it is especially to be obserued in the sea. For how many sorts of fishes are there, great, little, and of meane quantity; and how many sundry formes, and what diuersity of nature? I beleue verily, that whosoever should vndertake to number them, by every kind, and particularly, should be almost as much troubled, as if he would purpose to empty the Ocea. But though there be not any little creature in the sea, wherein God doth not declare & shew himselfe great and admirable; yet doth he chiefly manifest himselfe so to be in two things. The first is in the hugeness and power of the great fishes which hee hath created, as whales and such like, which rather seeme to be sea monsters then fishes, there being no beast in all the earth so great and strong: for there are some that seeme a farre off to bee islands or mountains, rather then fishes. And the other most wonderfull thing is, that the Creatour hath set such a correspondency in many points betwixt the fishes and beastes of the earth, that it seemeth hee would represent a great part of the one by the other. So we see also that many names of earthly beastes are given to many fishes, because of the similitude & likenesse, which they haue together in figure and in nature: yea it seemeth that God would represent in the fishes of the sea, almost all the other creatures which are in the rest of the world. For there are some which bee called Starres, because they are like that shape, according to which men commonly paint the starres. Moreover, how many are there which beare the shape of earthly creatures, yea of many instruments made by men? For amongst others, there is a fish called (the Cocke) which is also named by fishers in some countries, the loyner, because it hath almost as much diuersity of bones and gristles, as a loyner hath of tooles; the forme of which they also represent. But if wee speake of the sundry fashions, of fishes, and of their colours, scales, heads, skinnies and finnes, and of their vnderstanding industry and chafe, and of their shels and abiding places, and of their natures and infinite properties; who should not haue iust cause to wonder? Moreover, haue not men forged many fashions of weapons, the forme of which they haue taken from diuers fishes? What shall we also say of the finnes and little wings which God hath given them, to direct them, and to hold them vp in the sea and in other waters, like birdes in the aire, and as ships are rowed and guided by oares, and the rudder? Seemeth it not that God hath created them, like watry birds, to whom he hath given wings agreeable to the element for to sustaine themselves with, and fit for their nature, as hee hath done to the fowles of the aire. Wee also read in Genesis, that the Lord did make in one day the birds and fishes, and every flying thing. For as the aire hath more agreemēt with the water (then with the earth) and approacheth neerer to the nature thereof, so is there more answerableness betweene the creatures which liue & conuerse in these 2. elements, then is between them & the beastes of the earth. And therefore we see that the seed of both kinds is multiplied by their eggs, & wee must also note, that forasmuch as me can receiue no great fruit, nor much profit by fish, except in their victuals, or in some medicine or such like vse, which is not so cōmon as ordinary nourishment, God by his prouidence & blessing hath made them so fruitful, that they multiply & increase wondrously: as experience doth evidently manifest vnto vs, by the great number of fry or spawne that is found in one onely fish. Which fertility we must beleue to proceed from the power, which the Almighty bestowed vpon them: as also vpon all his creatures, when he said vnto them, [Bring forth fruit, and multiply, and fill the waters in the Sea, and let the fowle multiply in the earth.] A thing which we must well consider vpon, to the ende that we may referre to this blessing of God all those commodities which we receiue, either from those creatures, or from the earth it selfe, or from the other elements; and that wee must render him continuall thankes and praises therefore. For hee hath no lesse wise blessed all his creatures, then the fishes and the birds, when by his word he gaue their nature to them, in which hee created them, and did presently after commaund them to bring forth fruit according vnto that nature. To the end then that we may be the more induced to glorifie so great a workman, for the excellencie of his workes, which shineth in all creatures, let vs now intreat of some fishes most accounted of by those who haue written of their nature; and let vs consider of their singularities and woonders, so much onely as the scope of our discourse will permit vs, in such sort as wee haue declared in our antecedent speeches. To you then (A R A M) I referre the relation concerning this matter.

ARAM. IT is affirmed by all the learned, who haue diligently searched out the secret of nature, that the water bringeth forth more and greater creatures, then the earth doth, because of the abundance of the moisture that is therein. And the sea is so ample, and so fit to giue nourishment, & a gentle and fertile increase of all things by meanes of that generating seed which it attracteth from heaven, and the aide of nature ordained by the creator (which hath this propertie, to produce alwaies something that seemeth new) that it is no maruell if there bee found incredible and monstrous things in the water. For the seedes of all formes doe interlace and mixe themselues therein, as well by the windes, as by the agitation of the waues, that one may well say (as is saide commonly) that there is nothing on earth, which is not in the sea: yea, and that there are many things in it, which cannot bee found either in the aire, or on the earth. Now great fishes are chiefly resident vnder the Torrid zone, because that in the Ocean heate and moisture serue for augmentation, as saltnes doth for conseruation. And in this number is the whale, of which the ancients write, and whome some moderns call Gibbar (because that the common whale, which some take for the Musculus of Aristotle doth not answere to the description of this) which is of incredible hugeness. For if wee will beleue histories, there haue beene some scene of fower arcues of ground in length. They make an horrible crie, and spout out of two holes (of a cubite long, which they haue neere to their nostrils) so much water, that oftentimes drowne ships therewith. And of their crests men make faire rods, which seeme to bee of borne, or of bone, blacke in colour, and like to the hornes of a buffe, so flexible, that they can hardly be broken, and they do shine in the sun, as if they were gilded. Of every peece of his crest is a rod made, so that in one crest there are many rods. Moreover the bone of his whole head is so great, that one might make a ship thereof.

And as this kinde of fish is the heauiest and mightiest of all, so the Dolphin is the swiftest and most ingenious not onely of all watric creatures, but of those of the earth, and of the aire. For they swimme faster then a birde can flye. And therefore if this fish were not low-mouthed, there were no fish could scape him. But nature providing therefore, in putting his mouth vnder his belly, hath so restrained him, that he can catch nothing but backwards: whereby the great swiftnesse of such fishes doth euidently appeare. Wherefore when the Dolphin, pressed with hunger, pursueth any fish to the bottome, and that hee hath staied long there, alwaies holding winde, when he riseth he leaps aboue water with incredible quicknesse and force, to take breath againe. Some haue marked in this kinde of fish, that they haue their tongue moouable, contrarie to the nature of all other water-creatures. Their voice is as when one walleth. Their backe is bowed and bendeth outwards: they are very louing to men, and like well of Musicke: and indeede they doe not shunne men, as other fishes doe; but come right before Ships, making a thousand leaps and frisks before them. Sometimes also as if they had challenged the Marriners to trie who should goe speediest, they take their course along with the Ships, and do outstrip them, how good winde soeuer they haue.

Among Sea-fish also the Sea-calfe is very admirable. For he hath vdders and haire, and calueth vpon the earth as sheepe bring forth, and is deliuered of the second burthen presently after her young ones. He snorts mightily when he sleepeth neere to the shore; bee bleates and bellowes like a calfe, and for that cause beareth the same name. The finnes wherewith he swimmeth, serue for fecte on ground to goe vpon. His hide (where of the Islanders make girdles) hath a marvellous propertie, for the haire which is thereupon riseth when the sea increaseth, and falleth when it diminisheth. Some holde also that this creature is very capable of discipline, easily learning that which is shewed him: and that hee saluteth people by his lookes, and with a certaine noise and shaking that he makes.

Now let vs speake of the tortoise which is of a very strange forme. There are found of the in the coast of India so great, that one shell onely is sufficient to coouer a good pretie shed. And in the countrie of the Chelonophagi, there are some isles, where they ordinarily vetortoife shels in stead of boates. For we must note that there he three sort of Tortoises: the terrestrial, which breedeth in Forrests: marish ones, which breed in fens: & watry ones, which breed in the sea. Those then of this last sort haue in stead of feet so many broad grilles: they haue no teeth, but the nib of their beake is passing sharpe: and their vnder chap, doth close as insly within their epper chap, as a boxe doth with the lid of it. Being in the sea, they liue vpon shel fishes, for their mouth is so strong and hard, that they crush the, yea euen stones in pieces: yet when they come on land, they neuer liue but vpon herbs. They lay eggs like birds; so that sometimes one may finde an hundred together. And they neuer hatch them in the water, but putting them into an hole which they make in the ground, and covering them well, they smooth with their shels vnderneath the place wherein they are, and hatch in the night time for a whole yeere long.

Also amongst the fishes which are famous for their strange operative power, is the Tropedo or cramp fish: which is a kind of hedgehog, & hath many bristles, the touch of whom benommeth the fishers hands, by some naturall & secret vertue. And there be many kinds of these fishes, who haue all of them their shell covered with bristles very thicke, which bristles they vse in stead of feet to stay themselves vpon, when they mooue and stir from one place to another. Their head and mouth is the lowest part of them, & towards the ground. And amongst the rest, there is one, not of the kind of this bristled cramp fish, but a shell fish, which the Latins call (Remora) because it hath such power, that if it take hold of the bottome of ships, it staiteth them. Yet we cannot read that any such thing hath bin seen since the time of Caius Caligula the emperor: whom Historiographers report to haue bin one time staid in his ship by this fish to his great endommagement.

But the most wonderfull of all fishes is the Triton, (otherwise called the sea Bug) for hee hath haire vpon his head, the nose of a man, a broad mouth, & the teeth of a wild beast. His hands, fingers, and nailes, are somewhat like those of a man. And the rest of his body is covered with a thin shell, with a taile vnder his belly in stead of feet like a dolphin. Pliny reporteth that in the time of the Emperor Tiberius, the people of Lisbon sent embassadors onely to aduertise him, that in the course of their sea, there was a Triton discovered, blowing of an horne in a cave.

The Nereides also (otherwise called Syrens or Mermaides) doe very neere approach to humane forme, sauing that they bee rough and full of shels in euery part of their body. There are some also who tellie that they haue seene a sea man, hauing the entire forme of a man. Finally it is a thing that seemeth altogether incredible that the diuersitie of fishes; (or rather sea monsters, should be such as they affirme, who haue written thereof. But we may well beleue, that the facility of generation and of life in the waters, is cause of so many strange shapes. For heate and moisture consist together in generation and nourishment maintaineth life: and in the sea heate and fatte moisture, and nutriment doe abound. It is also to be noted, that by reason of motion, the pestilence neuer cometh into the water (as into the aire) for the Sea is euer mooued, and the aire is often still. For which cause all kindes of creatures may easily bee preserved in the Sea, but not in the aire. Again, fishes mooue themselves in the Sea easily, and without labour: which the beasts of the earth doe not, who therefore are constrained to be hungrie, or necessarily to bee consumed by too much labour and trauaile. Moreover, the Sea freezeth not, neither yet is too hotte (like the earth, and like other waters) except it be (and that very seldome) in the superficies thereof, which is touched by the aire. Therefore through so many commodities, and by the mixture of creatures of diuers kindes, many monsters are engendred in the Sea, so that sometimes when it ariseth by meanes of the flowing thereof, one may finde vpon the shore of the Westerne Ocean to the number of three hundred kindes of monstrous fishes. But although it seemeth that nature would expresse in fishes the formes of all terrestrial creatures, and put in them some resemblance of shape; yet in the hinder part all fishes are (except some few Sea-monsters) of a peculiar forme agreeable to their nature, and doe onely resemble other creatures in their forepart. For as the rudder directeth and gouerneth a Ship in the sterne, so the taile of a fish doth guide it in swimming, and for this cause the tails of all fishes almost are forked. But this is most certaine that their sorts and kindes surmount the kindes of other creatures in multitude, in greatnesse, in force, and in varietie of shapes. But our intent is not heere to number them as wee haue said; for so wee should finde matter enough to make a great volume; as others haue done. Wherefore to finish this argument; and this daies speech, see (ACHTROB) if by our discourses of the sea and of the waters, and of the living creatures which are engendred and doe live in them, you can deliuer any instruction, which may be answerable to that end, for which we especially continue our treatise concerning this great vniuers.

ACHITOB. LET vs not doubt (companions) but that we haue a goodly image in this daies discourse of the state of this world, and of all mans life. For first, what is this world, but a sea, wherein wee navigate and are in continuall danger; Nay the sea is so variable, so inconstant, and so outrageous? For if we haue neuer so little respite, peace and rest, (like as when the sea is calme, & quiet) presently there arise such violent whirlewindes, stormes and furious tempests, as it seemeth oftentimes that heaven, earth, and all the elements conspire and runne together to worke our ruine. Yea when this wicked world sheweth vs fairest countenance, and becommeth most calme and gentle, and that it feedeth vs with the fattest morsels, then is it most false vnto vs, and then are we in greatest danger. For when we thinke our selues most sure therein, then are we sodainely tost and carried away, as with violent waves and horrible whirlewindes, into the lowest gulfs and deeps of the earth. Moreover as the huge monsters of the sea, and the greatest and strongest fishes doe eate and deuoure the smallest and weakest; and as the craftiest entrap the simplest, and prey vpon them: even so is it with the men of this world. For the mightiest tyrants and the richest, strongest, and greatest rouers, theeves, and robbers doe pill, and take away the substance of the least and feeblest, and doe consume and deuoure them. And they which cannot doe so by force haue recourse to sleights, decites and treasons, by which they surprise the simple and meeke. And therefore also as the holy Ghost compareth in the Scripture tyrants, rousers, theeves, and murderers, to wolues, beares, lyons, and such like beasts: and the crafty and deceitfull, to foxes, dragons, and serpents, who do by subtiltie and guile that which they cannot performe by power and forces: so doth he compare them to huge whales, and to the great fishes of the sea. So because Nilus (a renowned riuer, whereof we haue already spoken) passeth through the land of Egypt, & runneth into the sea, by 7. mouthes or armes, Isay called Pharaoh the king and tyrant of that countrey, (Leuiathan, or Whale, which God did strike with his strong hand, and his mighty arme, ouerwhelming him in the red sea.) It is also said for the like consideration in the Psalme [Thou brakest the heads of dragons in the waters. Thou brakest the head of Leuiathan in pieces, and gauest him for meat to the people in the wilderness.] And the prophet Abacuc doth likewise compare the king and tyrant of Babylon to a great fisher who casteth his nets into the Sea, and causeth the fishes to come into them, and so hee taketh them.

But heere wee are to note, that although there bee some kindes of beasts who eate one another: yet are they not all of this nature. For there are but certaine of them that liue so vpon pray and rapine. And amongst them that so liue, there are but very fewe that eate beasts of their owne kinde, except great famine constraineth them thereto: Yea hunger doth inuite them that liue by pray, to chase and deuour others, rather then their owne kinde. For it is necessitie and want of sustenance that driueth them thereto. And though especially fishes doe least spare their owne kinde, yet doe they not eate one another, except when hunger constraineth them thereto to preserve their life. But men (most wretched surely) haue not all these causes to mooue them against their own kinde, against their own flesh and blood, as it is ordinarily seene that they are more cruelly and more fiercely bent one against another, then any brute beasts: but contrariwise they should be much better furnished in all their necessities, and should liue much more at their ease, if they could mainetaine good peace and vnitie one with another. Wherefore in that they doe otherwise, it is easie to iudge how much their nature is corrupted and peruerse, except they be regenerated by the spirit of God. For there is no bond of nature whatsoever, no nor that which is kept amongst the brutest beasts (as of the female towards her yong ones, or of the male towards the female, and such like) which men doe not shamefully breake and violate. But we must herein acknowledge a terrible iudgement and furie of God against them, them, because of their sinne, which hath so perverted and infected the first originall nature of the stocke of mankinde. For when hee giueth strength and power to the one for to torment and destroy the other, yea to most cruell tyrants and bloody murtherers, who make lesse account of men then of beastes; wee must learne this doctrine, that heerein the iust ordinance of the Almighty is very euident, by which hee punisheth the wicked by the wicked, and taketh reuenge vpon his enemies euen by his enemies themselues, as he hath threatned them in his law. And therefore there is lesse maruaile herein, then that God suffereth the small fishes to be eaten by great ones, the weakest by the strongest, and the simplest by the craftiest, as alio the gentlest birdes by the cruellest; and lambes, sheepe and other priuate, domesticall and harmlesse beastes: by wolues, beares, lyons, and other wilde beastes. For it is very certaine that the beastes haue not offended their Creatour, nor deserued his wrath through any sinne against him, as men haue done, who being created in his owne image are fallen from innocency and holinesse through their owne fault, and through the corruption of nature which the transgression of Gods ordinance hath brought vpon them. And if we cannot make answere for the cause of this nature of vnreasonable creatures, but onely that it hath so pleased God, who is the master and Lord of all these workes, and who hath provided for them according to his good pleasure: surely also when wee can conceiue no other reason for the tyranny and cruelty of men, exercised one vpon another, this same reason should then suffice vs. For the onely will of the eternal, the which cannot bee but iust and reasonable alwaies, must euer serue for reason, when wee cannot vnderstand the causes, as we would. But (as I saide euen now) this reason manifesteth it selfe sufficiently in his iust iudgements vpon men, because of their sinnes. Now albeit wee holde this sufficiently good in regard of the wicked, and of those who oppose themselues and rebell fiercely against the Almighty: yet the consideration might seeme to vs to bee otherwise in respect of the meeke, and of those whom hee holdeth not onely for his seruants, but also for his beloued children: who neuerthelesse are commonly a pray to the wicked, as sheepe are to wolues. I must indeede confesse, that these iudgements of God seeme more strange to humane reason, then the other doe: yet they are not so secret and mysticall, but that he manifesteth causes enough, not onely by his word, but also by common experience. For first, how much goodnes, holines and perfection soeuer can consist in any man, yet neuerthelesse as concerning his flesh, hee walloweth altogether in sinne, and very much naturall corruption, in pride, arrogancy, rebellion, & disobedience against God, which haue great need to be better mortified, humbled, tamed, and brought downe. Againe, how easie a matter is it for vs to forget our Creatour, and our owne selues, and to abuse all the graces and benefits, which wee receiue continually at his hand. Also seeing that he will bee glorified, and that his power shal be knowne in the faith, constancy, charity, and patience of his, we should not thinke it strange that he puts them to triall, exercising them by diuers great and dangerous temptations and afflictions. Now the tyranny, malice, crueltie, and perverseness of the wicked, serueth in all these things for his children and to his glorie, through his providence; notwithstanding that hee hateth all the wicked, vling them onely as rodde and scourges, to chastise and punish those whom hee pleaseth; as hee is likewise serued by diuels, without approouing their workes, in so much as they proceede from themselues. But there is more yet: For considering that God hath not created men like vnto beastes, onely to liue in this world, with a corporall and temporall life, but hath made them to immortality and eternall life like the Angels: he will then by the aduersities, which hee sendeth vnto them, here giue them to vnderstand, that other blessings doe attend for them farre greater then those, which may be talled vpon earth, and which are common betwixt them and beastes. Behold then the fruit, which mee seemeth must be gathered in our discourse this day: Now to morrow we will step out of the sea and waters, to take land againe, and to consider vpon the treasures and benefits therein, which it produceth for the commoditie of men, and the diuersitie of creatures that liue therein: whereof (A S E R) you shall beginne to discourse.

Genes. 1.

S the holy Scripture teacheth vs, that before God did create the beasts of the earth, he commanded the earth that was discovered and free from the waters, to bud forth the bud of the herb, that seedeth seed, the fruitfull tree which beareth fruit according to his kind, which hath his seed in it selfe vpon the earth (and it was so:) we must likewise vnderstand, that this commandement had not such vertue for that time onely, but that it endureth, and remaineth al-

tures are nour-

waies, and so till the consummation of the world. For all herbes, trees, and plants that the earth euer hath borne, doth beare, or shall beare, euen from the creation of the same vntill the end of the world, doe proceede from the first ordinance and eternall word of the soveraigne, by which all things haue been created. Wherefore Moses, to the end that men might acknowledge this diuine power, which maketh the earth, so fruitfull, doth expressely tell vs, that God gaue this fertility before there was any sunne, moone, or starre in heauen. For hee saith, that these goodly lights were created the fourth day: but that the production of herbes, trees and plants was on the third day. Thereby then must we learne, that although the sunne, moone and starres, besides the husbandry of man, doe serue by the ordinance of God for to make the earth fertile; yet for all that it can bring forth no fruit, if the word and blessing of the Almightye doe not giue it power. For as it was fertile before it was aided by the starres, enen so is it now in regarde of the tillage and husbandry of man. For there was neither man nor beast when it budded forth the fruites, which God commanded it to beare: yea so much wanteth it to become fruitfull by the trauell of man, that to the contrary it hath lost very much fertility, and a great part thereof hath become barren since his first creation, because of his sinne. For in lieu of the blessing that God at first gaue thereunto, hee saide afterwards to the man that it should bee cursed for his sake; and that it should bring forth thornes and thistles, and that hee should eate the fruites thereof in sorrow. For these causes then we must alwaies haue respect to the power of the word, & of the blessing of God, by which all things haue bin created in their order (as we haue heretofore declared) & man last of all, as the master piece of the Lords work. Who having determined in his eternall counsell to create man after his owne image and likeness (to the end that he might in this visible world represent his Creator, as in his most lively semblance) was not onely pleased to build him his lodging first (to wit the whole world) but would also replenish and furnish it euery where, to the end that nothing might bee found emptie. But that which is herein to bee chiefly considered, is, that this diuine providence having giuen essence to all corporall creatures, hath therewithall provided necessarie meanes to keepe and preserve them all in their natures. For minding to giue life to birds, to fishes, and to the beastes of the earth, he had already prepared their foode, before hee had created them, and had ordeined the earth as the mother and the nurse of all creatures which are engendered and which dwell and are conuersant therein; and in the waters and aire also, for the birds and fishes. Moreouer, as all bodies are composed of fire, of aire, of earth, and of water; so the Lords will was, that all these elements should conioyne together, and receiue aide one from another; to the preservation of liuing creatures by vertue of the alliance and agreement, which is not only betwixt the said elements, but also betwixt them and the celestiall spheres, as we haue already discoursed. For considering that they be the principles of things having life, they cannot liue, nor bee naturally conserued but by meane of the very same elements, from which they take their originall. And therefore the providence of

of God causeth, that they doe all accord together, to nourish and maintaine those creatures, which he hath made and created.

But seeing that we are in talke of the fertilite of the Earth, ordayned by God to that end according as we haue declared, who is it that can number the diuers kinds of herbes, trees, and of all sorts of plants which it produceth? And who is it that can but onely name and finde proper denominations agreeable vnto them? And if wee should speake of their diuerties and varieties in rootes, in stalkes, in stockes, in tops, in branches, in boughes, in leaues, in shapcs, in flowers, in colours, in seedes, in fruites, in tastes, in smells, and in fauours: who would not maruell very much? Wee see how the Lord speaking onely of the Lilly of the field, doth testifie, that Salomon in all his royaltie was not adorned like on of those: and therefore hee bringeth it as a testimony of his goodnesse in reproch of those, which take care for their clothing, as if they distrust in the providence of God, and as if they supposed him not able enough to apparell them; or at least, that hee had not so much care of men, as hee hath of the herbes and flowers of the field, which hee endueth and decketh with so gallant clothing, and with so many sorts of excellent faire colours, and yet they neither spinne nor haue weavers, nor clothiers, nor drapers, nor other work-folks and tradesmen to deale for them. Yea, how maruclous is the conseruation and multiplication of all plants, by meanes of their owne seeds, syons and fruits, according as the Creator did at first constitute? For that I may first speake of the smaller sort, who could beleene, if experience did not assure vs, that of one little graine of mustard seede should grow a great and high plant, like a little shrub, in such sort that the birds of heauen might make their nests therein. Then let vs consider, how corne, pulse, and all other sorts of seeds do bud, grow, and multiply. But who himselfe would iudge, that out of one little kernell of a nut or filbert, there could grow so great trees, and so much wood as should beare innumerable leaues and buds, and so much fruit each yeere, euery one according to his own kind, and that for long time. Would not all this seeme incredible, if wee were not ascertained by continuall experience, and a sure course in Nature? And if God doth shewe himselfe most wonderfull in all these things, in regard of the herbes, trees and plants: what shall we say, if we proceede of the consideration of their natures, properties and vertues, and of the commodities, remedies & profits, which men receiue thereby? This surely is the most principall point. For how admirable is it, that by the meanes of herbes, trees, and other plants, which haue no soule, that may minister life vnto them, with motion and sense, and which may much lesse participate with any reason, God doth not onely preserue the life of men, and of other creatures (a thing to bee woondred at) but doth also thereby giue them strength, vigour, and force? For what are these herbes and plants, which produce all sorts of corne, pulse, and other graine, of which men make foode, and are thereby nourished? What is the vine and other fruit trees? Who could thinke, if he saw it not with his eyes that there is neither man, nor beast, that could be nourished and preserue his life, but by such meanes? For how can that thing either giue, or preserue and maintaine life, which hath no life in it selfe? And yet if wee will consider of the medicines and remedies, which men finde in herbes and plants onely, besides those which they may take from other creatures, who can in truth either declare or write, I will not say all of them, but onely the thousandth part? For although the most excellent phisitions haue alwaies travelled in this part of their art, which is commonly called the knowledge of Symples; yet how farre off are they from the full and perfect theoricke of them? For what a number of herbes and rootes be there which are vnkowne, and haue yet no name? And how many are there which are taken one for another, and wherein the most skilfull Phisitions and Herbarists are oftentimes deceiued? And yet this little which we know, should moue vs to thinke vpon the great & ineffable hountie of God towards men, & vpon the fatherly care which he hath of vs all. For though that by our sinne we haue merited death both of body and soule, which death our sinne hath not onely gained, but also many diuers and strange sorts of diseases and corporall infirmities most grieuous and terrible; yea sometimes hideous and horrible, which are like butchers and slaughterers to put them to death: yet the charitie and loue of our God is alwaies so great towards mankind, that he giueth vs as many and more; yea lundry medicines for one onely malidie. But wee will be instructed more amply by you (A M A N A) in this matter, wee may acknowledge therein very cleere testimonies of the providence of God.

Deut. 16.

A M A N A. It is daily scene, that by the meanes of some small herbes, which growe in a garden or in a moun taine, or in some other desert place, and which also are oftentimes troden vnderfoote, without any account made of them; many are commonly deliuered, not onely from great paines and grievous maladies, but even from death it selfe, which otherwise it seemeth would most certainly approach. Wherein certes, wee haue a goodly subiect to consider, that if God giueth this vertue to creatures of small estimation in comparison of many other, and by the meanes of them bee ministred so great helpe, and doth so much good to man; what must be the power and bounty of that great soueraigne phisition, which maketh them preuaile, and giues them power to heale? For wee must vnderstand, that it is not the herbes, nor other drugs and preparatiues, nor yet the apothecaries and phisitions, who make and compound them, that are the true cause of restored health to the sicke: but God alone, who doth not only giue the remedies, but also knowledge to men for to vse them, and to bee skilfull how to apply them to their owne necessities, for which hee hath created them. Herein then we must acknowledge two great benefits, that the most good and most puissant God hath conferred vpon vs. The first is that hee hath giuen vs medicines fit and necessarie for healing. The other is the knowledge of them, and the theoricke how to apply them to their conuenient purpose and vse. And one of these benefits without the other, would indeede but little auail vs. For as the worke man cannot worke without such stuffe as is requisite for him to make his worke of, as also it would bee vnprofitable if no man should employ it, and put it to vse: for the same cause, God, which taketh care of the least of his creatures, hath imprinted in the nature of brute beastes, that want vnderstanding and reason, a certaine knowledge of things that are fit for them, not onely for their nourishment, but also for remedies in their diseases, so that they neede no other phisitions but themselues onely.

But in this discourse we are to note, what iudgement we must make of so great vertue, as wee finde in all herbes and drugs, and by like reason, that we must consider thereof in the propertie of corne, bread, wine, and of all meates and drinks, which are as ordinary and continuall medicines for the preservation of life. For if that which is diminished and consumed daily in vs, were not also repaired and destroyed daily by our meate and drinke, wee should fall suddenly into grievous maladies, & finally into death. For almost then as it pleaseth God to preserve the life, which he hath giuen vs and to maintaine vs in health and good disposition; hee giueth power to that, which wee eate and drinke, to doe this. But if it should please him to doe otherwise, there were neither meate nor drinke, which could giue any sustenance and conuenient nourishment vnto vs, but would rather conuert within vs, into deadly poyson, to take away our life, and hasten our death, even as God doth oftentimes to that effect vse the aire, without which we could no more live, then without meate and drinke. And therefore when it pleaseth God that we shall live in health & long time; he maketh the aire good and holosome for vs, otherwise it pleaseth him to strike vs with sicknesse, and to hasten our death, hee chaungeth it, as if it were im poisoned, as wee doe very often finde in diuers contagious sicknesses, and chiefly in time of pestilence. The like also is in victuals, drinckes, and medicines. And therefore the Lord menaceth his people by Esay, declaring vnto them, that he will take away the staffe of bread and of water: that is to say, the substance and naturall vertue, which he hath giuen them to nourish, which is the force that sustaineth them, who are sustained, as a staffe that sustaineth him that is weake: and as man cannot live, except hee haue both meate and drinke sufficient; the Prophet hath comprised vnder bread and water, all things needfull for nourishment, and for the life of man. It is therefore in these things, that God saith, hee will take away all power, as also Moses doth amply declare in the blessings and curses of the Lawe. For let vs also note, that when God will punish men by dearth and famine, he doth not onely make the earth barren (as hee threatneth) but also curseth that little fruit, which it beareth, yea in such sort, that it still diminisheth, and hath not the accustomed vertue and power to nourish. And therefore, when the corne is sowne it yeeldeth not so many eares, nor so many grains graines in the field, as is expected, & as it seemeth that it should yeeld. And afterwards when it is gathered and reaped, and that it commeth to be threshed, there is yet found lesse corne then was esteemed to bee. And being laide vp in the barne, it consumeth more then of custome: carried to the mill, it yeeldes lesse meale then is looked for: yea beeing kneaden into dough it seemeth to diminish: briefly it seemeth to faile being made in paste, brought to the oven, and so baked, when it is in the binne, and vpon the table, yea in the hand, in the mouth, in the stomacke, and in the bellie. For it doth not satisfie, nourish, and sustaine so well as in time of plentie and abundance, but they which feede thereof, are alwaies hungrie and famished. And so we may thinke of all other meates and drinks even as wee finde the contrarie in the blessing of God, when through it hee giueth fruitfulness to the earth, and abundance of all things, according to the testimonie of his word. As then wee are admonished to haue recourse to him onely, to demandaunt our daily bread, and all other things needefull for this life: so must wee also doe, when we are visited by sicknesse. For hee is the foueraigne and onely phisition, who can of himselfe heale vs. It is hee that striketh, and giueth remedy, which bringeth to the graue, and draweth out againe; which killeth, and raiseth vp againe. And therefore hee saith to his people by Moses. [If thou wilt diligently harken vnto the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt doe that which is right in his sight, and will giue eare vnto his commandements, and keep all his ordinances; then will I put none of these diseases vpon thee, which I brought vpon the Egyptians: for I am the Lord that healeth thee.] But although that God alone can doe all thinges, without the aide of any creature, and without the vse of any meanes, except hee please: yet doth hee choose out such meanes as he pleaseth, to performe his workes towards vs, and to distribute his gifts, and that chiefly for two causes. The first is, for that hee will not haue his creatures remaine idle, but serue to his glory, and for the good and health of men, considering that they were created to that end. And the other cause is, that it pleaseth him to accommodate himselfe to our infirmitie, which is such, as wee do not thinke that hee is neere vnto vs, nor that hee can nor will do it, except we haue alwaies some visible signes. Although then it is as easie for him to nourish vs without victuals and without drinke, as with them; and to heale vs without Phisitions and medicines and drugs, as hee doth by meanes of them: neuerthelesse it is his pleasure to doe it by such aides, and hee will haue vs subiect to this order. And therefore let vs thinke, that to despise the means which he giueth for the mainetenance of this life, is as much to despise his commandements, like mockers and rebels. And if wee be such, wee may not hope for any succour from him, seeing wee reiect the remedies, by which hee will giue them vnto vs. But wee must alwaies come to this point, that although we cannot receiue the benefits which it pleaseth the most good God to communicate vnto vs, except by the meanes ordained by his providence thereto, yet neuerthelesse wee must not attribute this power to any of his creatures, but to him onely, and must giue him the whole glory; considering that hee taketh them not for any neede which hee hath, or that without them hee could not performe his workes, but only for the aide and supportation of our infirmitie. And therefore let vs beleue, that bread, wine, and all other meates; drinckes, drugs and medicines, haue not any vertue of themselves, but so much onely, as God infuseth into them, as as he thinketh needfull for our good, by such instruments as hee ordaineth thereto. Wherefore men runne in vaine to such aides, and especially to Phisitions and Apothecaries to bee succoured by them, except God the foueraigne Phisition do put his hand thereto, and except he bleesse their art and labour. Experience certainly doth yeelde vs daily testimonies thereof. For it oftentimes happeneth that in stead of helping, Phisitions doe hurt; and in stead of healing, doe kill. And how so? Because there are very fewe which adresse themselves to the true & Almighty Phisition, and who haue not more confidence in mortall men then in the immortal God, as king Aza is accused in the Scripture, and punished for this fault with death. True it is that some faile, in that which they make none account of the ordinary meanes established by God, despising both Phisitions and all the medicines of their arte, which is almost as much, as to refuse the vse of those benefits which God giueth vs at neede. But the greatest number consisteth of those, who not onely haue recourse chiefly to the professors of this science, and put all their confidence in them, but will moreouer in stead of vsing the aduise and assistance of good and learned Phisitions, adresse themselves more willingly to Empiricks, and such as are ignorant, or else are Sorcerers, Enchanters, Witches, and worshippers of Diuels. If then our desire bee, not to faile faile with the one nor the other, we must rest in that way which is shewed vs in Ecclesiasticus, to wit, [Honour the Physition with that honour that is due vnto him, because of thy necessitie : for the Lord hath created him. For of the most high commeth healing, and the Physition shal receiue gifts of the king. The knowledge of the Physition listeth vp his head, and he shall be in admiration. The Lord hath created medicines of the earth, & he that is wise will not abhor them. Was not the water made sweete with wood, that men might know the vertue thereof? So hath hee given men knowledge, that he might be glorified in his wondrous works.] Which is much to say, that as God hath sweetned the bitterness of the waters in the desert, by meanes of wood which he caused Moses to cast therein, to, so likewise doth he manifest his power by the art of Physicke, shewing marueilous effects thereby. And therefore the wise man doth adde [With medicines God healeth men, and taketh away their paines. Of such doth the apothecarie make a confection, and yet he cannot finish his own work, for of the Lord commeth prosperitie and health ouer all the earth. [And finally he exhorteth the sicke to praie: saying,] My sonne faile not in thy sickness, but pray vnto the Lord, and hee will make thee whole: leaue off from sinne, and order thine hands aright, and cleanse thine heart from all wickednes. Then giue place to the physition for the Lord hath created him: let him not goe from thee, for thou hast need of him. The houer may come that their enterprises may haue good successe: for they also pray vnto the Lord, that he would prosper that, which is given for ease, and their physicke for the prolonging of life.] Wherein namely this holy personagedoth evidently declare, what is the vertue of physitions, if they desire, that the Lord would blesse their works, without whose blessing they can neuer come to a prosperous end. Behold then what seemed good vnto me to note concerning the true vse of the great and excellent gifts, which God communicateth with vs for the mainetenance of mans life. And pursuing this subiect, let vs speake something more particularly concerning the diuersity and singularitie of diuers plants: the discourse whereof (A R A M) I commit to you.

Of the diuersitie of plants, and of their difference and naturall growth, and of their parts, and of the most excellent amongst them. Chapter 67.

Four kinds of plants.

In what we must take the difference of plants.

A R A M. THE learned teach, that there are foure kindes of plants, to wit, trees, shrubs, vnder shrubs and herbes. Now a tree is that, whose stock waxeth greene euery yeare, and therefore groweth to great height, as the peare-tree. The shrub called of Latines (Frutex) is that whose stocke remaineth for many yeares together, but it groweth not very high (as the rose tree and the myrtle.) The vnder-shrub called (Subfrutex) resteth also vpon the stocke, but exceedeth not the height of herbes (as the broome.) And the herbe is that which hath neither stalke nor stock (as honsleeke and sage:) or else hath a stocke, but so as it changeth euery yeere (as the fennell.) And yet a fift kind may be added betweene the herbe and the shrub (as rue:) because that sometimes it groweth great like a shrub, and sometimes remaineth like other herbes, which is also vsuall to the cabbage. But generally all plants may attaine to great height by husbandry. Also amongst faller herbes, specially those which are greene, doe oftentimes grow into shrubs, by the industry of man in winter time whereby it appeareth, that we must not take the true difference of plants, and of their kinds by their greatnes or growth: no more then in that the leaues of plants are not all of one bignesse, or because they alwaies stay vpon some, and fall off from others: or because they differ in colour, or else because one plant is barren, and another beareth fruit. But we must take this difference in foure things, which are the vertue and propertie, the odour, the saviour, and the shape of the leaues, buddes, fruite, barke and rootes, and generally of the whole plant. Of which foure differences the principall is the faculty, vertue or propertie: for the vertue proceedeth from the forme, and the forme is that which distinguisheth the kindes. And therefore though the willow, and the Vitex (called Agnus castus) haue their leaues and barke alike, it should neuertheless be a manifest error to vse the one for the other. For the Vitex is hot and drie in the third degree (of which it hath this marke, that it driueth away ventosities, and flourisheth first amongst all trees:) but the willow is cold and moist flourishing very late, and causing ventosities. Now for the odour or sent, one may evidently know by them the temperature of plants. And therefore they which are are of one kinde, although the one growe in India, and the other in Scythia, yet doe they necessarily participate with the selfe same principall vertues. And for the saour and figure, they are discerned by the taste and eie: wherein it is necessary to imploy much diligence and labour, to iudge well concerning the difference of plants. Those then which are alike in forme, in power, in odour, and taste, may without doubt bee accounted of one selfe same kinde: For wee search out the names of them according to their vertues. VVhereupon ensueth, that they which have one selfe same vertue, may bee comprised vnder one kinde, though the herbalist call them by sundry names, according to the proportion of their figure.

Now some plants doe growe naturally in fieldes, and forrests, some in the sea, other in riuers, others on the shore side, some in marishes, some amongst stones, sands, and grauell, some in pits, and so of others in such like places. For the place, in which they grow, or to which they are remooued (and the temperature of the aire) are much available to cause them growe, and fructifie. Through which occasion, there are higher trees, more flourishing, fairer to behold, and more charged with leaues, and fruite, in some places, rather in other. Whereupon ensueth that such as loue mountaines (as the Cedar, Sable, Pine, the Turpentine tree, Box tree, Iuniper tree, Beech, and the Plane tree) doe there grow high, and faire: as in the Plaines and low forrests, the Oke, the Beech, the Corcketree, the Elme, the Maple, the Ash, the Hasell tree doe growe best. But neere to riuers and watric places, the Plane tree, the Alder, the white and blacke Poplar, the Tamariske, the Willow and the Reede doe spring at pleasure: though many of them doe grow in mountaines, vallies, plaines and forrests, but they prosper not there so well. This difference also is marked in herbes and shrubs. For some grow well in marishes, others in lakes and pooles, others on riuers sides, other prosper in watrish and muddie places, others againe not abiding them, doe growe in drie and stonie ground. Some spring indifferently both in moist and drie ground. And some require the fields, others vineyards, and others meadowes. Some also loue the vallies, others hillocks, and others high mountaines. Some likewise prosper in priuate places, and grow neere to wals of townes and cities, and some grow in old ruines. But it is to be noted, that though each kinde of plants grow and prosper best in his proper ground, and doth loue very much his owne naturall situation, yet sometimes herbes are found indifferently in mountaines, hillockes, valleies, fields and meadowes. Likewise the industry and trauell of man doth bring to passe, that that which is strange, becommeth domesticall, yet not without some manifest difference betweene the pure naturall production, and that which is caused by arte. Moreover the parts of plants are the roote, the stocke, the branches, the leaues, the fruit, the stalk, the tufts called (Vmbellæ) the graines, the feedes, the flowers, the mossie downe, the wood, the barke, the sinewes, the inner pill, the vaines, the sap, the pith, the gum called (Lachryma) the knot, and many other small parcels, which the curious obserue therein: all which serue to distinguish trees and herbes one from another: which parts are somewhat answerable to the parts of liuing creatures. For the roots seeme to agree with the bellie (as Theophrastus holdeth) or else with the mouth (as others maintaine, who referre the lower part of the stocke to the bellie) and the leaues haue some reference to the haire; the barke to the hide and skinne, the wood to the bones, the vaines to the vaines, the matrice to some entrailes, which cannot liue without the matrice, the flowers to egges, the feedes to feede, the branches and boughes to the extreme parts of liuing creatures, and the fruite to the mensstruous blood, wherein the feede is many times incloled. Moreover the parts of parts are worthy of consideration, as those of the roote, whose middle part is as it were of wood, out of which the plant doth oftentimes bud, and is therefore defended with greater strength. And therefore if this middle part be taken out of garlicke, that which remaineth is not so sharpe, and of so strong saour as before, and it seemeth likewise to be lesse full of iuice. Next, the second part is (the rinde or coate) which is verie small, and the third is the peelee or huske: and the fourth is the inner peelee, which inuironeth the huske, which is not properly called so, because it is meant for that, which compasseth the feed of the fruit, and the fruit it selfe; and also because it containeth that which enuironeth the wood in the roote, instead of the feed. Whereby it appeareth, that they which cast away this part full of wood when they make their decoctions, do very ill considering that it is the most excellent of the rest, and of greatest force: for that which produceth the feede, that onely containeth the whole vertue thereof, because it alone hath life. That part then which is of wood, seemeth to bee the chiefe and principall substance of the medicine: because that that thing only which liueth, produceth the seede, and in that part onely wherein it hath life. For although that in succorie, and such like herbes, some leaues grow out of the barke: yet the herbe it selfe, and the seed doe proceede out of the wood. As the leaues then are in the stalke or slip, so is the barke in the wood: and both leaues and barke are therein for safegard thereof. In the lower part the iuice falleth into the roote: by the middle part the roote is nourished, and in the vppermost part it is conuerted into seed. Wherefore the vppermost part of the roote is best, and most different from the nature of earth. The flowers likewise haue their parts; for there is a kind of leafe in the flower which alwaies shineth, and is in all flowers, because it is made of a very fine substance. The buddes likewise wherein the flowers are containd are parts of them; and the seede of which the flower springeth, as it is cause of the generation thereof; so is it a part of the flower, and so is the stalke or foote, called (Pediculus) in which all these things are as it were planted and adioyned thereto. Let vs also note, that amongst trees the old are of more subtile qualitie then the other. And enery tree, which beareth leaues all the yeere long, is hot and drie (as the palme tree, the oliue tree, the cedar, the myrtle.) But this reason is not available in herbes: for houseleske is of a grosse substance, and yet beareth leaues all winter. And indeede both in herbes and trees they which grow wilde abroad are better then the domesticall: and so are they which are odoriferous, much more then they which haue a badde sauour, and haue no sent at all, especially if they grow in mountaines: and therefore they are preferred by phisitions before the other. And wee must note, that most commonly the rootes smel better, and are sweeter then the other parts of the plant, except the flowers, which is so because the concoction is best done in the rootes. For all things, which haue the humour well boyled, smel best: for that humour is most subtile and close. For which cause, all flowers almost doe smel well. For by reason that the humour which is in them is very subtile and little, it is the more easily concocted therein: and therefore also it sooner perisheth. But this humour remayneth, and is preferred in the rootes and in the stocke; for the subtile substance thereof being well concocted, doth abide in the earthie substance, whereby wee learne why young folkes haue sweeter breath then olde and distempered people. For children haue their humour verie subtile, and the small humour may bee very well concocted in young folkes, by the great heat which aboundeth in them. But want of heat hindreth it in olde folkes, and the qualitie of the humour is hurt in those that are distempered, and causeth that the decoction cannot be performed. Now we haue stayed long enough in this discourse. But as wee haue distinguished plants into fower principall kindes, let vs now speake of the nature and proper tie of the most especiall among them; to the end that according to our intention wee may not passe over any of the workes of God, without producing some testimonies, which may cause vs more and more to celebrate his diuine prouidence. Then (ACHITO) begin you to entreate of trees.

Of trees, and especially of the Pine, the Fir tree, the Cypresse tree, and the Cedar. Chapter. 68

Four differences of plants transported.

Property of the plants according to the quality of the regions where they grow.

ACHITO. IT is doubtlesse, that the difference of trees of one kinde is chiefly caused by the diuersitie of regions. And therefore amongst those trees that are transported from one place to another, some do beare fruit (as the Palmes at Genoa) some also beare, but vnperfectly (as the Pepper tree at Millaine.) There are some that cannot grow, (as the wood of Aloes brought out of India into Italy.) And some beare perfect fraite, because they can agree with the aire, and with the soile as well of one countrey as of another (as the Vines transported out of Spaine into India.) But above all, the calmenes of the aire, and the answerableness of the place are of great efficacy in the naturall propertie of trees, and do often cause them to beare great quantitie of fruit and blossomes, and are the cause that some are alwaies greene. And therefore about the Grand Cairo, in the Countrey of Elephants, the leaues doe neuer fall off the figge trees and vines: and in the Isles and other regions of the West Indies, discovered by the Spaniards, there is neuer a tree, but is alwayes greene. And therefore there are diuers trees, both of one, and of diuers kindes also, higher, greener, and fairer to behold in one place then in another. For in hote and moist Countreies all plants grow greater, fuller of iuice, and greener, if the proper

pernature of the plant doe not hinder: and in hote and drie places they are smaller and drier, and yet of no lesse vertue: But in moist and colde regions, the plants are weake and full of sappe. And they which are hot by nature, grow broad and high; but the colde are small. Now all trees, whereof we now particularly entreat, do by nature grow greatly for the most part, and flourish a very long time. As Iosephus recordeth, that Abrahams Oke did yet stand in his daies. And there were betwixt the destruction of Hierusalem and the death of Abraham, two thousand yeeres. And next to the oke, the palme, the beech, the oliue tree, the elme, and the pine tree do flourish longest.

Now will I proceede to a particular description of some trees, the most worthy to be considered of: amongst which the Pine challengeth the first place: whereof there are two kinds: one is domesticall, and the other sauage. The domesticall kinde hath an infinite sort of branches vpon the very vppermost toppe of the stocke, which spread round about it, beeing very thicke of leaues, which are pointed in the end, and long; it beareth plenty of great and sound apples, wherein are certaine harde kernelles inclosed, as blacke as soote, in which the fruite is found, beeing couered with a thinne yellow skinne, easie to gette off, by pilling it with your fingers. And this fruite is sweete and pleasant in taste, of a fatte and oylie substance. For the sauage or wilde one, there are many sorts of them. Some growe on mountaines, others on the sea coast. They of the mountaines are of three kinds. For there are some that bee highest of all the rest, which abound in the Forrests of Bohemia, Silasia, Polonia, and other places, whereof the countrey men make pitch. Which are euery whit like to the domesticall sort, sauing that their apples bee lesse: for they bee not much greater then those of Cypresse but they are a little longer, and more sound, and husked like those of the domesticall Pine, beeing full of gumme, and of a sweet sent. The second kinde of these mountaine Pines are such as haue no stocke or trunke, but sproute their branches out of their roote close to the earth, running along the ground till they attaine to tenne or fiftene cubites length: they beare fruite like vnto the other, but of a bigger size, and fuller of gumme: and are found in many places of Italy. Finally there are many other which are of goodly height, and yet not so high as those of the first kinde, neyther haue they the barke of their stockes yellow like the other pines: likewise their fruite is somewhat inclining towards redde, but more brittle then all the rest. And the kernels, of them are three square and crooked, and in taste somewhat like those of the garden pine: sauing that they leaue a certaine quicke sharpnesse in the mouth (which is proper to all wilde trees) and they abound in the territory of Trent. And the gumme that proceedeth out of all these sorts of pines, is white and sweete. The sea pines are of two sorts, differing only in the greatnes and smallnesse of their fruite: and doe all of them produce white odoriferous gumme, which turneth into a thin liquor, whereof men blacke pitch. Moreouer, as concerning the fruite of the pine in general, it is most certaine, that therein are many great vertues and properties, and that it is very profitable for mans body. For it is a moderate temperature, but that it inclineth more towards heate. It ripeneth, it mollifieth, it resolueth, it farneth, and it nourisheth well, it correcteth the humours, which are corrupted in the intrailles, neuerthelesse it is hard in digestion: and therefore to such as are colde of nature, the kernels are ministred with hony, and to such as are hot, with Sugar, to correct the strength of those kernels. They doe helpe (being often eaten) the paines of the sinewes, and are good for those that be troubled with the Sciatica, palsie, shaking, and numnesse of members. They cleanse the lungs and the corruption of them, purging out all clammie humours and rottenesse. They are profitable against the cough, and the corruption of the raines and bladder: wherefore they ease them much who piisse but drop by drop, and feele their vrine burne. They fatten leane folkes, and being taken with the iuice of purslaine, they do helpe eruptions of the stomack. Also the picked leaues of a greene pine being stamped & drunk with wine, do appease paines of the heart. But the patient must abstaine from all fat meats. Of the scales that couer the Pine apples being sod in very sharpe vinegar, is made a singular perfume against the Dysenteria. And the water of those apples very greene, being distilled through a limbecke doth wash out the wrinkles of the face. Moreouer of the oldest Pines is pitch made, which is called Naual, by reason that it is very good to pitch Ships: which to doe men cut downe the Pines with an hatchet, which are become full of gummy iuice, and hewe them in pieces, as they doe other trees to make coales of. Whereupon let vs note, that they which inhabite mountaines say, that it is a maladie among pines, when not onely the heart thereof, but the outward part of the stocke doth couert into a gummy substance: which happeneth to them through great abundance of liquor, which causeth them to die, enen as too much fatte suffocateth liuing creatures. And out of this gummy wood is pitch, by wondrous skill extracted, and the oyle and foot are separated, which haue diuers properties in medicines.

Of the fir tree and of the rot sin which it produceth.

Let vs now speake of the Firre tree, which groweth vprightest of all the trees, and therefore is very fitte to employ in all workes: There are such high ones, that in Sweden some are seene of an hundred foote in length, and that of some which are straight and of a like thickenesse every where without knottes, men may make worke of an hundred and tenne foote long. This tree beareth fruite of a spanne long, composed of certaine scales, beeing one compiled vpon another, vnder which the white seede is included, without any iuice in them. It produceth an exquisite liquor and gumme betwixt two barks, which is called in vulgar Italian (Lagrime) that is, the Teare of the Firre tree, and it runneth vnder the first barke; which being opened, lies like the matter of an old impostume. This gumme is liquid, of a very good smell, and somewhat sharpe in taste. It is very good for green wounds, not onely because it searcheth them, but also because it is mundificatione and incarnatiue. Being assumed in drinke, it cleanseth the reines of grauell, & doth much asswage the paines of the gout, and of the Sciatica. It healeth maruailously well all wounds of the head, so that no other thing be applied therein.

Of the cypres tree, and the properties
thereof.

The Cypresse is likewise rich in beauty and in properties: of which trees there are male and female: the female growes alwaies pointed towards the toppe, and the male hath his branches spread abroad. Each of them is a very high tree, straight, and bearing branches onely in the toppe thereof. And this tree is driest of all others, hauing the humour very fat, and well digested. And therefore it agreeth not with dung and excrements, and waxeth dry neere to waters. The wood thereof is odoriferous, and looseth not the sent by oldnes, neither is eaten with wormes, nor doth rotte through any fault: but the leaues of this tree beaten into powder, and strowed amongst apparell, or with the seede, do defend them that wormes cannot annoy them. It beareth fruite three times a yeere, which is hard and sound, containing the seed within. It casteth out of the stocke some gum, but very little like vnto Turpentine, and almost of the same nature. This tree is very common in Italy. But the right and naturall country thereof is the isle of Candy, for in what place soeuer the ground be there removed and tilled, if nothing else be sowne therein, the Cypresse will presently spring vp of it selfe. The decoction of their nuttes made in strong viaeger, asswageth the paine of the teeth, if the mouth be often washed therewith. So much doth the decoction of the leaues. Which nuts being stamped and drunke with old wine, appease the cough. They are very good, and the leaues also, to search great wounds in tough bodies. Whereby it appeareth, that this tree hath the vertue to dry vp, without much sharpnes and heate, as the taste doth testifie. For one shall taste therein very little sharpenes, much bitternes and more sowernesse.

Of the cedar,
and of the gum thereof.

The Cedar also is a tree that groweth very big, and beareth fruit almost like to that of the Cypresse tree, but a little bigger. There be some that beare no fruit although that they bud. And that which beareth fruit buddeth not, and the new fruit appeareth thereupon before the old is perfectly ripe. Out of this tree runneth an excellent white and liquide gum, which in time is by heate of the Sunne congealed into graines. In Syria, and especially in Mount Libanon the Cedars grow very high, and in great plenty, and are very like to Firre trees. Their branches from the bottome to the top, are almost spread and placed round about it, in fashion like the spokes of a wheele, and the highest are euermore shortest. Wherefore this tree a farre off seemeth to represent the figure of a Piramis. The heart or pith of the Cedar is very hard, sweete, and red: wherefore the ancients supposed that the wood could not weare, nor become worne eaten: but would endure for ever. So Salomon caused the holy temple of God in Ierusalem to be builded thereof: and the Pagans made their statues of it, thinking it would endure as long as Marble or Brasse. Some say that the greatest which was euer seene, was hewed in Cypresse to make the gally of Demetrius, which had a eleuen oares vpon a side. For it was one hundred and thirtie foot long, and as thicke as three men might fadome. There are also in many places of Greece, two kinds of small Cedars, which are like to the Iuniper tree. Now all Cedars are of nature hot and drie in the third degree: And the oile, which is made of their gum approacheth to the fourth degree, and is very subtil. Wherefore it doth easily and without paine rot soft and delicate delicate flesh: but in hard bodies it operateth with more time and difficulty. It drieth dead bodies, and preserveth them from putrification, by consuming the superfluous humours, without touching the sound parts: but in living bodies, the heat which consisteth in them, doth augment the forces of this oile, which causeth it to burne the tender flesh. Wherefore having such vertue, it is no marvell if it kill nits, lice, wormes, and vermine in the eares: and if being applied it killeth the child in the mothers womb, and being dead doth void it out, with many other effects which Physicians attribute vnto it. But I commend to you A S E R the sequelle of our discourse concerning trees.

cloves. Chap. 69.*

A S E R. THeloue of ones native soile hath a marvellous power in all things: for nature produceth in some places, such stubborn plants, that for any endeavour and paines which one may take with them, yet can they not be retained or kept but in their owne proper ground. Many great personages both in France and Italy have taken paines to tame them, and cause them to grow in gardens, orchards; and other most pleasant places, as any in the world. But as rustical mountaineers despise the delights and gallantnes of cities, and esteeme not of civility and honesty of manners, not being able to live any where at ease and pleasure but in their owne cottages: so it seemeth that many plants, which are brought amongst vs, and husbanded with great care and labour, despising the sweetnesse of the aire, the beauty of gardens, the pleasant watring of fountaines, and the goodly company of infinite herbes and trees already made familiar, having at last retired into their owne deserts and wildernesses, and into the place of their originall. Now of the number of these is the Cinamon, which though that whiles Rome flourished (as many authours record) it was planted in diuers places, yet now is there not any of it to be found throughout Italy, nay in all Europe. But Asia aboundeth therewith in many places, yea so doth Arabia felix in diuers parts, & much more India, especially in one island called Monorique, the mountaine whereof beare plenty of Cinamon trees.

This tree is somewhat like to our Laurell tree, having many branches, at the ende whereof, it beareth very small blossomes, which being dried by the heate of the sunne, and fallen on the ground, there is formed thereof a little round fruit, not much bigger then an hassell nutte out of the kernell whereof the islanders doe extract good oile, wherewith the diseased do rubbe their sinewes, and other infirme parts. The king of Monorique receiveth great profite through these trees: for none may bee permitted to touch them without his licence. And certaine moneths of the yeere hee causeth some twigges and syons to bee cutte, the smallest and finest that may bee in the tree, and the barke of them to bee peeled off, which is sold very deare to such strangers as trafficke therein. For this is the best of the tree. But the Cinamon which is brought hither, is nothing els but the second barke, that is peeled off, which beeing cut with a little knife, rowleth vp together of it selfe, and changeth colour. Moreover the property of Cinamon is to dry and heat to the third degree: for it consisteth of very subtil partes, and is very sharpe in taste, and of a certaine quicke astringion, by meanes whereof it taketh away and dissolueth the superfluities of the body, and fortifieth the members. There is a distilled water made of Cinamon, which is strong in smell and taste, and is of great vertue. For take a pound of Cinamon, bray it, and put it into a vessell with fower pound of Rose water, and halfe a pound of whitewine then set your vessell being very close stopped, in warme water, and then make your distillation in the same water, being placed vpon a furnace, wherein the fire is temperately maintained, in such sort that the saide warme water doth alwaies boile. And this distilled water is very soveraigne against all diseases that come through colde, for it dissolueth and consumeth fleame and clammy humours, & chaseth away all windines. It doth especially comfort the stomacke, the liuer, the spleene, the braine, and the sinewes. It is a singular and present remedy against faintnes of the heart, against paines and prickings of the mouth and stomack, it resisteth poisons, & bitings of venomous beasts; it prouoketh vrine, & the flowes in women. It is good for those that have short breath, that are sick of the pally, or have the falling sicknes. And in a word, when need is to heat, to open, to pierce, to resolute, and to comfort, this water is very profitable therefore.

Of the tree bearing cassia.

the cassia.

Now let vs speake of the tree that beareth Cassia. For it is in the number of the greatest and most singular trees. The wood thereof is massiue, close, of the colour of boxe neere the barke, and blacke in the middest like Ebony. When it is Greene, it hath a badde smell, but this fauour doth weare away being dry. It beareth certaine cods, which hang vpon the branches very long, round, and massiue, which being ripe, waxe blacke and somewhat reddish. And they are full of soft and blacke sappe, like to thicke creame, not sticking altogether like marrow in a bone, but is contained as it were in little cases, being one separated from another by thinne skinnes set very close together: betwixt every one of which there is a very hard graine. In Egypt and in India are very many of these Cassia trees, and in the isle of Taprobana. Their cods are not very great, but cleere, heavy, and very full: in such sort, that if they bee shaken, one cannot heare the graines rattle therein, and these are the best. The sappe or iuice of them is hotte and moist in the third degree. It is lenitive and loosening, and purifieth the blood. It stancheth heat of choler, and doth moderately loosen the belly. It is maruailously profitable for those that cannot make water, especially if it be vsed with medicines that prouoke vrine. It purgeth choler and fleame, and mollifieth the breast and the throat, and resolueth inflammations therein: it cleanseth the raines from grauill and sand, if it be drunk with the decoction of licoras and other simples fit to prouoke vrine: and if it be often taken, it hindreth the stone in the raines. Besides all this, it is good against hot agues, and being outwardly applied, it asswageth inflammation.

Of the frankincense tree.

frankincense.

Amongst aromaticall trees, the tree that beareth frankincense is worthy to bee considered of. The forme thereof is somewhat like to a pine, and out of it runs a liquor, that afterwards waxeth hard, which we call frankincense: whereof there are two sorts. One sort is gathered in sommer in the dog daies, in the greatest burning heate of the yeere, at which time the bark is split, being then fullest of moisture. And this frankincense is whitish, transparent and pure. The other kind is gathered in the Spring time, by meanes of another incision, which is made in this tree in winter, & it is somewhat red, approching nothing neere either in goodnes or value, or else in waight or vertue to the first. Arabia hath many Forrests wherein frankincense is found. And the inhabitants of the countrey do lance the trees with a knife to cause them distill gum the better, or else the liquor whereof it is made: amongst which trees there are some that may yeeld aboue threecore pounds euery yeere. Moreouer being taken in drinke it is very good against Dysenterias and fluxes of the belly. It encreaseth the memory, chaseth away sadness, reioiceth the heart, and is profitable for all the passions thereof. It also staieth the bleeding at nose, being incorporated with the white of an egge and aloes, and put into the nostrils in a tent. It likewise appeaseth the paines of the megrim, being mixed with myrrhe and glaire of an egge, and applied to the forehead and temples. It is also hot in the second degree, and dry in the first, and hath some astringion, which is but little found in that which is white.

Of the tree
that beareth myrrhe.

myrrhe.

Let vs speake of myrrhe, which groweth abundantly in the same regions where frankincense doth. The tree which beareth it is full of prickles in some places, being of five or six cubits high, very hard and crooked, and thicker then the Frankincense tree, the barke smooth like a Laurell tree, and the leaues like those of the Olive tree, but rougher, hauing certaine sharpe prickles at the end. Out of this tree there distilleth a Gumme liquor like teares, which hardneth by litle & litle, and is of color somewhat green, & is cleare and sweet, though somewhat vnpleasant in taste through bitternesse. Whereby it appeareth that the myrrh which heere wee haue is not right, for all these markes are not found therein, but it is blacke, and as if it were scorched, mouldy and mossie on the outside. Which wee neede not thinke strange, considering that euen in Alexandria, where our men doe commonly buy myrrhe, there is scarce any to be gotten which is not soppiflicate. For the Arabian Mahometans, who bring it thither, And sell it, doe therein vse a thousand deceits, mocking at such Christians as trafficke with them, and at their curiosity. There is great difference then betwixt naturall mirrh, which distilleth out of the tree; and artificiall, being soppiflicated with gum, and mixed with other things, such as is ordinary in our Apothecaries shops. Now the right myrrh is of a hot and drie qualitie in the second degree: and being drunk, it is very profitable for those that haue the quartaine ague. It is vsed in in Antidotes against poisons, against hurts by venomous beastes, and against the plague. And being applied to wounds in the head, it will heale them.

Let vs now speake of the tree that beareth cloues, which groweth in the southeaste countries in certaine Isles of the Indian sea. The stocke thereof is like to that of a boxetree ^{Of the cloue tree.} and so is the wood. It flourisheth almost like to a laurell tree, and the fruit groweth in this manner. At the end of euery little branch there doth first appeare a budde, which produceth a flower or blossome of purple colour, afterwards by little and little the fruite is formed, and cometh to that passe, as we behold it, being redde when it groweth out of the bloome: but by heat of the Sunne it waxeth blacke afterwards in such sort as it is brought hither. The inhabitants of the countrey, especially of the Isles of Molucca, doe plant and set cloue trees almost in the same manner; as we in Europe doe our vines. And that they may preferue this fruit and spice a long time: they make pittes in the earth, wherein they put the cloues, vntill such time as merchants come to carry them away. This tree is full of branches, and beareth many blossomes white at first, afterwards greene, and at last red. The people there shake and beate the vppermost boughes of the tree hauing first made cleane the place vnderneath: for no herbe groweth neere about it; because it draweth all the moisture of the earth to it selfe. And the the cloues are so shaken downe are put to dry two or three daies, and are then shut vp till they be sold. That cloue which sticketh still fast to the tree, doth waxe great; yet differeth not from the rest, except in oldnes: though some haue held opinion that the greatest are of the male kinde. This tree springeth of it selfe, out of one only corne of a cloue, which hath fallen on the ground, and it endurerh an hundred yeeres, as the inhabitants report. The vertue of cloues is very great. For they are good for the liuer, the stomack, and the heart. They helpe digestion, and bind the fluxe of the belly. They cleere the sight, consume and take away the webbs, and cloues in the eies. They heat and dry to the third degree, they strengthen and open both together, and are very piercing. Being beaten to powder and drunk with wine, or the iuice of Quinces, they staie vomitings, cause lost appetite to returne; fortifie the stomacke and the head. They heat very well a cold liuer. And for this cause they are ministred very profitably to such as haue the dropie, especially to those, who haue water spread throughout all their body. The smell of them fetcheth those againe that haue swooned, and heeing chewed they sweeten the breath. They are good for such as are troubled with the falling sicknes, with the palsey, and with the lethargie. Being eaten or taken in perfume, they preferue from the plague, and are very commodious for such as are subiect to Catarrhes, and for such as are stuffed in the nose, if they receiue the smoke thereof into their nostrilles. In brieft their vse is infinitely diuers and profitable, both in phisicke and in our ordinarie diet whereby wee restore nature. And sith we are in this talke, let it be your part (A M A N A) to entreat of other trees bearing Spices.

Of trees and plants that beare Nutmegs, Ginger and Pepper. Chap. 70.

A M A N A. Amongst fise kinds of nuts which the earth produceth, to wit, the common Nut, the Nut of India, Nux Metella, Nux Vomica, and of the Nutmeg, this ^{Of the Nutmeg tree.} is the most singular and of rarest vertue: which hath taken name from muske, by reason of the sweete and pleasant sent thereof. Now they who haue travelled into India make great report, that the trees which beare Nutmegs, doe abundantly grow in an Isle named (Banda) and in many other Isles of the Moluccaes: and that it is as great, and as long branched as a Walnut tree with vs: and that there is but small difference in the growing of Nutmegs, and of common nuts. Moreover, this fruit is at first couered with two barkes, whereof the outtermost is hairie or mossie, vnder which is a thinne bloome, which like a net or fillet doth embrace and cover the nut, and is like a skaule or coife called (Mace) whereof there is great account made, and it is reckoned among the most precious and rarest spices: which we plainly see in those Nutmegs that are brought whole from the Indies, being preferued in sugar or in iuice of carrouges. The other barke which couereth the Nutmeg is like the shell of an Hasell nut, out of which they take it to bring vnto vs, which is very easie to do by reaso that the time of ripening being come, this hard shell openeth and sheweth an inward rinde that inuironeth the nut about, which wee call as aforesaid Mace: which at that time appeareth as red as Scarlet; but when the nut is dry, it turnes yellowish, and is thrife as deare as the nuts themselves. That which is more to be admired in this tree, is, that it beareth the fruits thereof, being so excellent, naturally without any industry or husbandry of man. Moreover, the best nuts are the newest (not rotten) the heaviest, fullest, most oylie, & abounding in moisture, so that if one thrust a needle therinto, there doth presently some iuice issue. They are hot and dry in the second degree and restrictive. They make sweet breath being chewed, and take away all stinking smell thereof. They cleere the sight, strengthen the stomack and liuer, abate the swelling of the spleene, prouoke vrine, stay the fluxe of the belly, driue away ventositie, and are marvellous good against cold diseases in the womb. In sum, they haue the same vertues that Cloues haue. And when they are greene or new, being bruised and well heated in a vessell, and then put into a presse, there issueth a licour, which being cold, is congealed like to new waxe, and so smelleth passing sweet, and is very excellent for old griefes of the sinewes and ioints engendred through cold.

Of Ginger.

Now speake wee of Ginger and other spices, which for the most part growe in the same regions of Asia, and especially in the Indies, and Molucca isles, whereby Nutmegs abound. In them there is great quantity of Ginger, which is a roote, not of such a plant as may properly be called a tree, but rather an herbe, considering that it groweth not very high, but beareth leaues like a cane or reede, which do waxe greene twise or thrise a yeere. This roote is very knotty, and not aboue three or fower spannes deepe in the ground, and some times so bigge, that it waigheth a pound. They that digge vp these rootes, do alwaies leaue a space between two knots in the pit, and couer it againe with earth as being the seed of this plant, to receiue the fruite thereof the next ensuing yeere, that is the rootes, which shall be newly sprouted. In Calecut the greene Ginger is sleepe and conserued in sugar, or in a kinde of hony that is taken out of certaine cods or husks, and is conueied into Italy, where it is much more esteemed then that of Venice. For that which is there is made of dry rootes artificially mollified, and which want much of their vertue and power. Moreover Ginger is very profitable: For it helpeth digestion, it looseth the belly moderately: it is good for the stomacke, and profitable against all things that may dimme, or blind the sight. It heateb much, not at first tasting like pepper. For which cause we may not thinke it to consist of so subtile parts: the heate would els presently declare it selfe, and it would suddenly become hot in act. Whereupon Ginger is known to bee composed of a grosse and indigested substance, not dry and earthy, but moist and watry, which is the cause that it doth easily corrupt and rot, to wit, by reason of the superfluous moisture thereof. For such things as are very dry, or moistened by a digested, natural, and moderate humidity, are not subiect to corruption and rottennes. Thence also it proceedeth, that the heat which commeth of Ginger doth endure longer then that of pepper. For as dry stubble is soon on fire and soon burnt out: euen so is the heat that proceedeth from simples, and dry drugs. But that which issueth from moist ones, as out of greene wood, doth inflame slower, and endure longer.

Of Pepper and the diuers kinds thereof.

Pepper doeth grow abundantly in the Indies, and especially in the two Isles called (the greater, and lesser Iaua) It doeth grow vpon little trees, the leaues whereof resemble much the leaues of a Citron tree, the fruit whereof is no greater then a ball. And according to the diuers places where Pepper groweth, it is different in kinde: yea in one place there are diuers sorts, and chiefly round and long Pepper. Now in some Isles (as alongst the riuer Ganabara) when the inhabitants plant Pepper, they bury the roote thereof neere to some other fruit trees, and oftentimes neere to young palmes or date trees, vpon the top whereof the twigs or syons doe at length grow. Which the rodde and small branches pulled from Pepper trees doe likewise, being planted with the same trees, which they imbrace running to the very top of them: where the Pepper hang in clusters, like the grapes of a wild vine, but closser and thicker. And when it is ripe they gather it, and lay it in the Sunne to drie vpon lattises made of Palme trees, till such time as it become blacke and wrinkled, which is commonly done in three daies. And this Pepper is round. But the trees that beare long Pepper doe differ from the rest especially in leaues and fruit: for the leaues are sharper at the end, and the Pepper hangeth vpon the tree like clusters of nuts made and heaped with many little graines. There is yet another kind of Pepper, called (Ethiopian Pepper) or (pepper of Negros) which groweth in cods like beanes, or pease: and the graines thereof are a little lesse then those of blacke Pepper. Moreover, all Pepper is hotte in the fourth degree, and therefore it burneth and blistereth the bodie, so that the vse thereof cannot but bee dangerous, though it haue many secret properties against the quiverings and shakings that accompany fevers, which usually come to one; and against the cough, and all maladies of the breast. There is also a kinde of watry pepper, which groweth neere to slow waters, that runne but softly. The stalke thereof is knottie, massiue, hauing many pits, out of which the branches doe grow. The leaues of it are like to mints, sauing that they bee greater, softer, and whiter. The seede is sharpe and strong, and groweth vpon little twigs neere to the leaues in manner of grapes. It is so named of the places where it groweth, and the likenesse of taste, which it hath with common pepper. But wee haue spoken ynough concerning spices. Let vs now consider of other most rare and singular trees the woonder whereof declareth the author of nature to be exceeding admirable, as we may note (A R A M) by your discourse.

Of the Date tree, of the Baratha or tree of India, of the Gebuph and of Brasill. Chapter. 71.

A R A M. THose Portugals, Spanyards, and some French men that is in our time haue nauigated through the Atlanticke sea towards the south, and from thence towards the east vnto Calicut Taprobana, and other isles of the Indian sea, and regions vnkowne to ancient Cosmographers, doe make credible report vnto vs of so many diuers singularities which they haue beheld, that we should be too vngratefull towards them, if so often as we behold any of them in their writings, we should not attribute praise vnto them for their laudable curiositie, which hath vrged them to such discoveries, considering that they are like so many mitrors, to represent vnto vs that great Architect of nature, who amongst the very Barbarians hath engrauen images of himselfe in euery worke of his omnipotencie. Now among such trees as they haue written of, and which (as me seemeth) are worthie of greatest admiration, although they bee not altogether so rare as many others, the Date trees require place, which are very common in Arabia, Egypt, and almost in all parts of Africa, and in Iudæa, as likewise in many Isles of Greece, and regions of Europe (where they beare no fruite, which is not so throughout all Africa) for the Palmes, or Date trees beare in many places a sweete, pleasant and very delicate fruite to eate, and this tree is very high, and hath the stocke thereof very hard, bearing no branches butt round about the top, with the ends of them hanging downe to the ground wards. It buddeth forth many blossomes, hanging at certain fine small stalkes, clustered together in figure like to clusters of saffron, but much lesse, and white: and of those are formed reddish Dates, which haue a very hard, long, & crested stone within them. And there are of these trees male and femall, which are discerned in that the femall buddeth without blossomes, or floures. And that which is most admirable in this diuersitie of kinde, is, that the female being separated from the male, will hang downe her branches and whither, turning her selfe that way, whither her male hath bene carried: so that the inhabitants of the countrey fearing to loose her, take of the earth and of the roote of the male, which they lay about the scoote of the female, who through this meanes springeth, reneweth strength, and beareth fruit. It is noted in Date trees that there are some, which naturally follow the Sunne, which way soeuer he turneth, as many other plants doe, which hauing a sympathy and secret inclination to this Starre, as acknowledging his vertue, and that their vigour is deriued from him, do alwaies behold him, and themselves loosing colour, when he is farre off from them. And this is also very wonderfull in the Date tree, that being dead, it reuiuet of it selfe, by meanes of the proper rootes thereof, which being (very deepe vnder ground) maintained by the radical humour, there doe at length spring out of them certaine stalkes, which are afterwards sustained by the Sunne, there nourished and made trees, bearing fruit as before. Moreover out of the troncke of Date trees, many people (especially the Negroes) doe extract a licour (which they vse for a beuerage instead of wine) by making a large slit therein with a certaine instrument a foote or two above the earth. And this licoure of whay, very good to drinke, and almost as much inebriating, or as strong as wine, for which cause it must be very oftentimes mixed with water. And when it runneth out of the stocke, it is as sweet as new wine: but it looseth that sweetnesse from day to day, becoming more pleasant to drinke, when it tasteth somewhat more tart, because it doth then slacke thirst best.

They also draw out of this tree certaine threds as fine as our thred, whereof they make tapistrie worke, which serue like other things to couer them: which neede not seeme very strange, considering that in many other places they beate the barks of some trees so hard (after they haue wet it) that they do draw it out so fine, and weaue it so artificially, as one would suppose it to be some faire and thin taffata. Such as haue sailed to Manicongo, and along the coast of Ethiopia, do assure vs therof in their writings. For if that cotten cometh from trees, and silke is spunne by wormes (as all men know) what should hinder the foresaid thinges to be of such abilitie through the ordinance of God established in nature, to the end that men might receiue from these plants, that which is needefull for them, and which they cannot obtaine by the meanes that are common to others? But if any make doubt thereof, because it is notoriously knowne vnto all, then must wee shut the doore against all things that seeme rare. But what shal we say to that, which is taught vs by many graue Authors, that of the fruite of these trees, called (the Thebane Date) beeing dried in the sunne, till such time as it may be ready to be ground, men vse to make bread, which is a common practise amongst those of that countrey? Moreover, for the particular vertues and properties of Dates, they are so much different, as there be diuers kindes of them: for some are drie and binding (as those of Egypt) others are soft, moist, & sweete (as those that grow in Syria, Palestina, and Iericho.) And the rest are in meane betwixt these two kindes: and all are hard in digestion, and breed headach. Some say that two greene dates (hauing their stones taken out, and then filled vp with powder of Vermillion) beeing eaten, doe keepe women with child that they may not abort: and that beeing dried they bee good to ease by such as spit blood, to such as haue a weake stomacke, and are troubled with the bloody fluxe.

Now let vs speake of a tree, that doth much resemble the Date tree, and is no lesse worthy of wonder then it, because it serueth for bread, wine, oyle, and vineger. This tree is called by the Arabians (Baratha) and of some (Iausfalindi) which is as much to say, as, the Indian tree, and the Indians name it (Trican) and the fruite thereof (Nisior) or Cocco. It is found in many Islands of India, chiefly in Zamat, and in the circumiacent Isles, where the people liue vpon the fruite of this tree, which fruite is as bigge as a mans head: and is that, which we terme (An Indie Nut.) The outtermost barke of this tree is all greene, & about two fingers thicke: amongst which they finde certaine fillets, whereof they make cords, wherewith the inhabitants of the countrey sowe their boats together. Within this barke is another, which they burne and beat to dust: afterwards they vse this powder as a medicine for their sicke. Vnder this second barke againe is a certaine white pith covered, which is about a finger thicke, and this they eat in stead of bread, with flesh and fish. And to make it the better, they dry it first, and then bring it into meale, and make very good bread thereof, as the auncients in olde time made of Acornes and of chestnuts, for want of corne. In the middelt of this pith they finde a very cleere, sweete, and cordiall water, which being crudled, and conuerted into an oylie substance: they boyle it, and then this mixture becomes so fat, as the best butter that can be made amongst vs. But if they would haue vineger, they set this water in the sunne without making it to boyle, and it will become cleere and sharpe, and as white as milke. For their drinking liquor, it runnes out of the branches in great abundance. And two of these trees suffice for the nourishment of an whole family. Furthermore, their fruite is hot in the second degree, and moist in the first. There is oyle drawn out of it very good against the hemorrhoides, and which healeth the paines of the reines and of the knees, and purgeth the belly of wormes. This Indie Nut bringeth also mens bodies into a good fat estate, and restoreth leane and consumed persons.

In the Isles of the Malucoes, especially in Taprobana doth likewise grow a tree of a meruailous propertie and effect, which is named in their language (Gehuph) and of the Indians (Cobban) It groweth very high, but the leaues thereof are small. The barke is all yellow, and the fruite big and round like a ball, hauing a nut enclosed within it, wherein is found a meruailous bitter kernel: the tast wherof vpo the tongue doth neere approach to the fauor of Angelica roote; the fruit is very good to staunch thirst, the kernel (for all it is so bitter) doth much surpasse it in sweetnesse through the excellency thereof. For they of the country doe make an oyle, which they keepe carefully, because it is very good against the paine of the liuer, and spleene, whether it be taken inwards, or outwardly applyed to the diseased part. They keepe them also from the crampe. This tree likewise yeeldeth a certaine gumme, whereof they vse plaisters against all paines of their members.

But

But amongst many singular trees, found out in our daies in the South in the wilde country, that is one, which doth serue to die with; which hath beene a great commodity to Merchants, and a meanes of new voy ages for such, as had accustomed to go to sea: who entering into those countries, when they beheld the Sauages decked with many faire plumes of diuers, colours, and that they had their bodies likewise diuersly painted, they made inquiry by what meanes they became so coloured: who shewed them a certaine tree, which we name (Brasill) and the Sauages call (Oranoutan). This tree is very faire to looke vpon, having the outter rinde of grayish colour, and the wood within red, and especially the heart, which is the most excellent part of all the tree: and therewith merchants doe chiefly furnish themselves. This tree hath leaves like the Box tree, as small, but thicker, and fuller and alwaies Greene: and it beareth not any fruite, or gumme. That which groweth in the land of Morpion, and at Cabo Frio, is better than any other. And there also is great store and quantitie of other trees seruing for tinclure, and every one of a sundry colour: One is so red, that it imitateth in fresh colour the finest scarlet of the world. Another hath the inside so yellow, as nothing can be seene to approach neerer the pure colour thereof. Some are all blacke, and other reddish: and there are some of so faire a purple colour, as the ancients neuer vsed fairer. Moreouer there is found a tree as white as fine paper, meruailous faire, and very pleasant to behold: which might haue beene very good, in times past, to make tablets to write in, then when men were ignorant of the vse of paper. In fine wee haue no colour, bee it simple, or compound, whereof there be not some trees to represent it naturally in the countrey of Sauages. But heere let vs leaue strange trees, and speake somewhat of our ordinary trees. And because that the history of them were sufficient to make vp a very great volume, we will content our selues to consider vpon a few of such, as shall seeme to vs most fit for our purpose, that we may conclude the discourse of this day, and of this matter together: as you (ACHITOB) shall presently performe.

Of Brasill, and other trees fit for tinclure.

Of the Citron-tree, Limon-tree, Orange-tree, Olive-tree, and Pomegranate-tree. Chapter. 72.

ACHITOB. Because that Citron trees, Limon trees, and Orange trees, doe prosper best in an hot and moist aire, in a thine and tender soile, neere to the sea side, and where moisture aboundeth, they doe not onely abound in our Europe, but also in many places of Asia and Africa, and in the Isles of the Sauages which haue bin discovered in our daies. Now these three kind of trees haue like agreeableness of nature, and doe resemble each other in propertie and vertue, and therefore require one manner of culture. The Citron tree is as great as the Orange tree, and Limon tree: and the leaves thereof are alwaies Greene, differing little or nothing from those of the Orangetree, being all of them peirced through with such little holes, that they can scarce be discerned. The branches thereof be flexible clad with a Greene bark, and thorny. It beareth blossomes somewhat purple, of the fashion of a bell, having some fillets hanging in the midst of them, and they haue fruit at all times. For when the ripe Citrons fall, there be others that waxe ripe, and others that begin to bud. But there is very great difference in this fruite, both in bignes and in taste. For there are some as big as Melons, as those are vpon the coast of Genoa, and in the isles of the Adriaticke and Egean seas. Some are a little lesse: others are as great as Limons, or a little greater, as are those of the Lake of Garda which are better with meate then all the rest, and taste more pleasantly. And for the biggest, being not so good to eate (because they haue more substance) they are fit for Apothecaries to colesue them in sugar or in hony. All of them beare the colour of gold; they are long like Limons, hauing a thicker rinde, wrinkled without, and of a sweete smell. They haue a sharpe pith within, full of iuice, in which the graine is hidden, in figure like to barley cornes, being covered with an hard peece, and of bitter taste. They grow all the yeere long, and are gathered when they be yellow. Moreouer these trees are nourished by the south winde, but are annoyed by northerne blais. They are sowed in their graines, and planted in twigs, boughes and graffes. The propertie of their fruit is to resist poisons, which their graine doth chiefly effect. And the decoction of citrons doth sweeten the breath, if one wash his mouth with it. Being put whole into chests with apparell, they doe not onely cause them to smell sweete, but doe also defend them from moths. If they bee eaten rawe, they are of hard digestion, and ingender grosse humours: but hauing beene confectioned in hony or sugar, they heat the stomacke well, and fortifie it. They are good against melancholy and all maladies proceeding thereof. The graine is especially good against the stinging of serpents, being taken in drinke, and applied outwardly. Their sharpe iuice doth repress choler, and is very good against the plague: by meanes whereof phylitions doe happily vse the sirrope which is made of it against pestilent feuers. Likewise the sharpe and drie qualitie ruleth in the iuice of citrons, and therefore it is drie and cold in the third degree, but the rinde thereof is drie, with much bitterneesse: so that it is drie in the second degree, not cold, but temperate, a little differing from the meane. Their meate is of grosse and flegmaticke substance, and their kernell bitter, and loosening, heating and drying in the second degree. If a citron be boiled whole in rose water and sugar, till such time a sit bee all consumed into iuice, and if one take every morning to the quantity of a spoonefull of this iuice, it will be a soueraigne preseruatiue against the plague.

Of Limons. Limons also haue the very same propertie, and their iuice killeth the itch of the body, it cleseth the spots thereof, destroyeth wormes, taketh away pimples in the face, killeth wormes in the bellie, and being mingled with sirrope, it is singular good against hot and contagious feuers. This same iuice is of so strong and persing vertue, that if you powre it out twise or thrise fresh, and wash whole pearles therewith, sleeping them in it, and afterwards expose them to the sunne, they will within five or sixe daies become as soft as hony, in such sort that you may fashion them how you list. Likewise if you steepe for certaine howers golde therein, it will diminish in waight. In briebe, limons doe not much differ from the vertue and nature of citrons: but they are commonly somewhat lesse, longer, and not of so thicke a rinde, fuller of iuice, sharper in taste, almost alike in seede, of colour pale.

Of Oranges, and of their fruit.

Oranges are more round, and being ripe they haue a very orient golden colour, their peeles thicker then that of limons, and more bitter. The iuice within, whereof they bee full, is not in all of one taste; for some are sweete, some sower, and some tart. Orange trees are alwaies greene like citron trees. They haue leaues like laurell, broad, thicke, smooth, sweete, and pointed. Their branches likewise are flexible, pricklie, and couered with a greene whitish colored bark. Their blossomes are white, of a very excellent smel, and are diligently gathered by perfumers, where there is any quantitie, for the composition of perfumes. Some also distill water of them, not only for the excellencie of the smel thereof, but also to serue in medicine, especially against pestilent feuers which cause blisters. Being taken in drinke, it is very profitable when neede requireth to haue infected humours euacuated out of the inner part of the body to the vttermoost part by sweatings: for this water doth cause much sweating, and doth greatly comfort the heart. The peeles of oranges is hotter, sharper, and bitterer in taste then that of citrons and limons. And sweete oranges are hot in all parts: but the iuice of all others is cold, and resisteth corruption. Wherefore they are good against feuers, which the sweete are not. Moreover their iuice pressed out of the rinde doth easily inflame, and doth also penetrate through great tenuitie within a glasse, even to the wine therein contained.

Of the Oliue tree.

The oliue-tree also is excellent amongst trees, and doth require a warme and temperate aire as that of Prouence. It is planted of twigs, and faire and fruitfull yong branches pulled from off the boughes of the tree, being very thicke, & of a foote and halfe long. Oliue trees haue long pointed leaues, thicke, smooth, greene above, and whitish vnderneath, bitter in taste, and somewhat sharpe. They bud in Iulie, and haue white flowers hanging in clusters, out of which grow the fruit, greene at first, and as they ripen paler; then waxe they purple: and at last turne blacke. They are gathered in the latter moneths of the yeare, being no sooner ripe. They are strowed vpon the floor, till such time as they become wrinckled. Afterwards they are ground, and then put into the presse with hot water, and so they yeeld their oyle. The wood of the oliue-tree is faire, full of veines speckled, massie, and burneth as well greene as drie. It is in no wise subiect to vermine, especially so long as it is planted, because of the odour thereof which is strong, yea it defendeth all other plants therefrom, which are neere vnto it, as likewise through the bitterneesse thereof it causeth Cabbages and Lettise to drie, and all other moist herbes, which are sowed in the plot with it. Oliues are gathered for two occasions, either that oyle may be extracted out of them, or that they may bee reserued for bankets, wherein they are reserued to excite the appetite: but all kindes

kindes of oliues do not serue indifferently for these two vses: for the greatest are best to eate, and the best to draw oile out of. They which are kept for seallts are conserued in brine, and salted vineger, in such sort as they retaine their naturall verdure. For the proprietie of the oliue, it hath in it a very restrigent vertue; for the decoction of the leaues in a clyster, staieth the fluxe of the belly: and the iuice pressed out of the leaues with white wine and raine water, restraineth all manner of bloody fluxe. The licour which distilleth out of the greene wood as it burneth, healeth the itch, tetters, and ring wormes. New oliues being eaten prouoke the appetite, and get a good stomacke although they harden the bellie. Being very ripe they are moderately hot, otherwise they are more binding and cooling. The oile that is extracted out of oliues is of singular vertue, being either applied outwardly or taken inwardly, according to the indisposed parts of the body: it looseth and mollifieth the bellie, dulseth the malice of poysons, and doth subtilly driue them away, yea if any venom or burning happen on the skinne of the body, and begin to make an vicer or sore there, nothing better to heale this hurt, then to annoint it with new fresh oile of oliues.

The Pomegranate tree also is to bee no lesse esteemed of, then the forenamed trees, because the excellency of the fruite thereof. The leaues of it resemble those of the Oliue-tree of a darke greene colour, very thicke, and full of many red strakes, hanging by a red sialke. The branches are pliable, and full of prickles. The blossomes red, and open like bells, the mouth of them cut in fashion of a starre: out of which proceede thinned red leaues, with certaine small seedes hanging by the midst, like them in a rose. The fruit is covered with a rinde like vnto leather, red without, and yeallow within, full of infinite pointed graines, red, full of a wine-like ioyce, with a stone in them. And these graines are separated one from another with maruailous cunning of nature, by fine thin yealow skinned. Moreover there are three sorts of Pomegranates, sweete, sharpe, and winie. And the qualitie of them all is restrigent, but not alike. For by their taste you may iudge of their difference. And their graines are more binding and drying, then their iuice: the rinde more then the graines; and the blossomes haue the same vertue with the fruite. And the powder of a Pomegranate, dried in an ouen, in a new earthen pot close stopped, being taken in drinke, is maruailous singular to stay the flux of the body. The leaues also of a Pomegranate tree well beaten, or the iuice of them mixed with oyle of roses, doth very much ease inveterated paines of the head, being often laid to the forehead. The boughes of this tree do chase away venomous beasts, for which cause the ancients were wont to lay them ouer, and vnder their beds. The decoction of the roote being drunke, doth also kill great wormes in the bellie, and doth voide them out. Now haue we laid enough concerning trees for the subiect by vs vnder taken: To morrow we will discourse of the most singular hearbes & rootes, to the end that in each sort of all kindes of creatures, wee may haue somewhat wherein to acknowledge in the chiefest manner the infinite power, and vspeakeable bountie of him, who hath made all these things for the vse of man. It shall be then your charge (A S E R) to begin to entreate concerning simples.

Of Mallowes, Wilde Mallowes, Purple Violets, Betonie, Ceterach, and Saint Iohns-Worte. Chap. 73.

A S E R.

He knowledge of Simples hath alwaies beene had in such estimation amongst the Ancients, that many great Monarchs both Grecians and Romans, although they were much troubled in the gouernement of their estates, haue neuerthelesse studied how to obtaine this science, and to illustrate it. For indeed it is not onely pleasant and delectable, but also very profitable and necessarie. And for this cause they haue beene much commended who haue diligently gently written bookes concerning plants, and concerning the vertues of them. And surely wee are not a little beholding to their diligence, by reason of the commodities that doe thereby redound vnto vs daily for the mainetenance of our health, which is the thing most to bee desired of vs in all the world. For so much then as wee haue so many goodly volumes amongst vs, that all persons may thereby with small travell become learned in this part of phisicke, which is abundantly therein entreated of, wee will satisfie our selues to passe away this day in discoursing onely concerning the most singular herbes and rootes, which we could therein note, and as we yet doe beare in memory.

Of Mallowes
and of their propertie.

All herbes may be diuided into two kinde, one is vnder the name of pot herbes, the other of phisicke herbes: although in very truth, there is in all of them, yea in many of those which are most common, very apt and proper vertues for the aide and mainetenance of health, and healing of diseases. But omitting those which are vsed in common foode, and which are well knowne to euery man, wee will onely speake of the most excellent in propertie, in respect of their marvellous effects in the nature of men. Amongst which, although Mallowes be very common, yet are they worthy of consideration. And we reade that the auncients did sow this plant in their gardens of deliberate purpose: for in those daies they did eate them like other ordinary herbes. And euen to this day in Italy, they are so well ordered by the gardiners, that they will grow as big as a shrub, yea in fixe or seuen months. Wee neede not make heere a particular description of Mallowes; for there is none but knoweth them well enough: but their vertue is verie admirable: for their leaues sod, being eaten doe take away all horsenes; and being powned with sage leaues, they make a singular plaister for wounds and other inflammations: they are also very good against bitings of venomous beasts being applied with leeks & onions: and the iuice of them dropt in ones eare, appeaseth the tingling therein. Being sod rootes and all, till such time as the decoction be all very thicke and clammie, they are given to women (to drinke) who are deliuered of their children with great difficultie; which helps them much: and the iuice drunke to the quantity of halfe a pound waight, doth profit them much. Their seed also drunke with redde wine, doth deliuer one from all desire to vomit. And their young and tender stalkes being eaten with salt, vineger, and eyle (as Sparage also) are very healthfull and laxative. Sixe ounces of their iuice being drunke, is very good for melancholie people, and for made folkes. In briebe the Mallow is aery profitable in many thinges, and was for that cause called by the auncients (Ommimorbia) that is to say, good against all diseases.

Of the wilde Mallowe, and the property
thereof.

The wilde mallow hath no fewer properties, & was therefore called by the Greeks (Althea) as being singular amongst all simples, and fit for many medicines: the vse thereof being very ordinary in phisicke, and it is a common hearbe knowne by euery one. Being sod in wine, or in honied water, beaten, and applied alone, it is good for all wounds, against the kings euill, against wormes in the eare, impostumes, inflammation of the breast, rupture of the fundament, ventosities, and shrincking of the sinewes: for it resolueth ripeneth, breaketh and healeth. The leaues thereof incorporated with oile are good to apply to all bitings, and burnings by fire, the seede and roote of this plant haue the same operation with the leafe: but they are more subtile, and more drying and abstersiue. The seede is good against the Dysenteria, against spitting of blood, and flux of the bellie; and so also is the decoction of the roote. And both of them serue greatly for difficulty in making water for grauel in the body, and do breake the stone in the reines. I must not faile here, to remember amongst the most excellent herbes, the purple violet, for because of the admirable vertures, which it containeth. I will not speake of the rare beauty of the flower thereof, nor of the sweete and pleasant smell thereof, though it be to bee maruailed at. But wee may affirme it to be as excellent and singular a medicine as may bee found in any part of the world. For Violets are temperate, and very good to alter and change the ill quality of humours, and to euacuate them. They chiefly purge choler, and qualifie the vehemencie thereof. They are good for paines in the head which proceede from heate: they cause sleepelesse: mollifie the pricking of the breast, and of the lungs: they are profitable against the squinancie, against the falling of the pallat in the mouth: they chiefly serue against inflammations of the breast, and of the side: and staunch thirst. Being drie they open the liner, cause inflammations to cease, and are very fit against the laundise. Moreover, the iuice of Violets, and the sirup that is made of them, mollifie the belly, and they be good to vse in plurisies, to purge. And if any one receiue a blow vpon the head, hee shall bee kept from dizzines, and other greater inconueniences, if soone after he is stroken,

he drinke the flowers of Violets braied, and vse this drinke for some time. It is also a singular, and gentle purgation and of no lesse vertue then Cassia; if you drinke so much of the infusion of the rootes of Violets in white wine as you can holde in foure fingers, after they haue been beaten in a mortar, beeing steeped a whole night in wine, and afterwards strayed through a cleane linnen cloth, which drinke you may sweeten by putting sugar therein. This secret was taught me by a learned phisicion of our time, and I haue oftentimes seen the experience thereof.

Betony is likewise an hearbe that is stored with many great vertues, and properties. For which cause the Italians, when they would highly praise any one, say in a common proverbe (Tu hai piu virtu, che non hata Betonica) Thou art endued with more vertues then Betony is. This herbe hath a small stalke, and in many places is found of a cubite in height: hauing leaues like an oake, soft, long, cutte round about, of sweete smell, great neere to the roote, and the seed therof at top of the stalke lookes like that of sauary. Now for the property of this plant, the leaues thereof brayed and laide to wounds in the head, doe presently learch them and healing them from day to day, it is not long ere they fortifie the hurt part. Being beaten and applied to the forehead, they heale the paine of the eies, which likewise the decoction of the root doth, being sod in water, til one third part be consumed, if you wash your eies therewith. The iuice of the leaues being drunk, doth purge downwards that blood; the great abundance whereof doth dazzle and dimme the sight. Wherefore Betony being eaten doth sharpen and clarifie it. And being beaten with a very little salt, and put into the nostrils, it stancheth bleeding at the nose. And the warme iuice being distilled with oyle of roses, and put into the eares, doth assuage the paine of them. The vse of this herbe is very profitable for those, which are pained at the stomacke, and haue short breath, who spit corruption, who haue paine in their liuer and spleene, and are troubled with running of the reines; it prouoketh vrine, easeth the gnawing of the belly and guttes (if it proceede not from encreasing of humours) and is very good against droplics, breaketh the stone, stayeth the spitting of blood, and taken fasting, keepeth from drunkenesse, being drunke often with wine, it healeth the iauundise, refresheth those that haue travelled farre, sharpeneth the appetite, resisteth poisons, venims, and bitings of serpents, and all other venomous and badde beasts; beeing not onely taken inwardly, but also applied outwardly to the wounds. In summe this plant hath so many properties therein, that a very learned phisicion amongst the auncients hath written a whole booke thereof.

Of Betony
& of the property thereof.

Ceterarch hath many vertues of Betony, it groweth on walles and old ruines, and vpon rockes, and in shady places. It hath neither stalke, nor flower, nor seede, but hath many leaues growing out of a roote, which are cut like those of mountaine Polipody, redde and hairy vnderneath, and greene aboue. The decoction of this herbe is good for all melancholy passions, it consumeth spleen, is profitable for those that can hardly make water, breaketh the stone in the bladder, and is good for them that haue the iauundise. Some bray Ceterarch leaues, to lay them hauing bene steeped in wine vpon the spleene, which serueth well for to open it. The yealow powder which is found behinde those leaues being drunk with a little white Amber, and with the iuice of Plantaine or of Purslaine, is marueilous profitable for those that are troubled with running of the reines.

Saint Iohns. woort also is a very excellent herbe. It is full of braunches of a sparine in height, reddish, bearing a leafe like to Rue, hauing a yellow flower like to a violet, which being rubbed betwixt the fingers, yeeldeth iuice as red as blood. This plant is called Millepertuis, (or thousand holes) because the leaues of it are all full of so small holes, that one can scarce see them, but onely betwixt their sight & the Sun. It beareth seed in rough, round, and somewhat long buskes. This herbe hath power to open, resolue, search, and binde againe. It heateth and drieth, and is of subtil substance; wherefore it prouoketh vrine. The seed thereof being drunke with wine, voideth the stone out of the body, and resisteth poisons, both the seed, and hearbe being eaten or taken in drinke, or outwardly applied, healeth inuenedomed bitings. The water distilled of this hearbe when it beareth flower, is singular good for those that are subiect to the Falling sicknesse, or are troubled with the paltie; if it be giuen them to drinke. The seed being beaten into powder with the iuice of Renouée, is good against spitting of blood. It purgeth the belly: the flowers and seede also haue a marueilous vertue to heale all wounds, except such as are in the head. Wherefore the oyle, wherein the flowers and coddies full of seeds shall haue bene long time steeped in the sunne, doth heale very well all greene wounds, especially if it be mixed with Turpentine. If the belly be rubbed with this oyle, it is good against the Dysenteria: and a spoonfull thereof being drunke killeth the wormes. There is a singular baulme made of the flowers thereof, with the fruit of an elme and rose buds, putting all together in a glasse bottle, and setting it in the sunne, till such time as all be so consumed that it seemeth to be putrified: then must all be strained through a cloth, and kept so to be vsed, chiefly for hurts and wounds of the body. Now (A M A N A) doe you prosecute our discourse concerning Sym-ples.

Mints. Chapter 74.*

Of Celondine & of the pro-
pertie thereof

A M A N A. IN the description of plants, wee finde that there is mention made of two kindes of Celondine, otherwise called (Clary) either of them indued with many vertues. That which is called great Celondine, hath a slender stalke of a cubite long, and hath leaved branches. The leaues thereof are soft and greene, somewhat inclining towards a blew. The flower resembleth that of the white Violet, which buddeth out according to the order of euery leafe. It beareth long and slender coddies, made pointed, wherein the seede is enclosed. This herbe is of a very abstersiue and hotte quality. The iuice thereof is very good to take out spottes, and the pinne and webbe in the eyes: but because it is very sharpe, you must before you apply it, mixe it with those things that may repress the sharpnes thereof, as namely with womans milke: beeing put into hollow teeth, it loosoneth them that they fall out. If you rubbe warts therewith, they fall off and dry vp. The decoction of the roote being drunke with annise seed and white wine, doth heale the iaundise, and is good for eating vlcers, and being chewed it allwageth the paine in the teeth. Some make report, that swallowes cause their young ones to recover lost sight, by applying this herbe vnto them, and that for this occasion it deriued the name thereof from a Greeke word, which signifieth a swallow, as being very well known by these birds, and commodious for them. Some Alchymists say for (Chelidonium) (Celidonium) that is (the gift of heauen) vaunting that they can extract out of this herbe a quintessence, not onely fit for their purposes, but profitable also to conserue the health of man, and to heale many diseases. Celondine the lesse is without stalke, the leaues are round and thicke, the flower yealow, hanging at a small stalke. It keepeth but a very little while: for it springeth and dieth in the Spring-time. And it is so named, because it beareth flower in that season, when swallowes come in, as also great Clarie doth. It is hot and dry in the fourth degree full, because of the great sharpnes thereof. And therefore so soone as it is applied, it breaketh the skin, and causeth bad nailes to fall off. The iuice thereof sauued vp into the nose, doeth greatly purge the braine, And a gargarisme made of the decoction thereof with honic, hath the same vertue, and euacuateth all euill humours in the breast.

Of Celon-
dine the lesse.

Of Cam-mocke, and the propertie
thereof.

Cammocke (or Rest-harrow) hath also many singular properties. It is a plant well known by countrey-folkes, because that as well with the branches, as with the interlaced rootes, it oftentimes stayeth the plough, maugre the oxen. It also vexeth mowers and reapers much. For how thicke leather soeuer they weare, yet will this pierce through like an aul, and as with needles wherewith it is armed being ripe. This hearbe hath many branches of a span long, turned with many knots; the leaues thereof are small and slender like vnto the leaues of Lentiles, approaching very neere to the forme of Rue, somewhat hairie, and of a reasonable sweet sent. The branches are full of very sharpe and strong prickles. The flower is purple, enclining to white, and sometimes yealow. Amongst other properties that this plant hath, it is aboue all most singular in the roote thereof for to breake the stone in the reines, and to void it out, especially when the conduits through which the vrine passeth are stopped vp. Some that haue vsed for a verie long time, to take the powder of the peeke

of this roote with wine, haue bin holpen of the stone. And according to the testimony of Mathiolas. A certaine man hauing vled for many moneths together of the powder only of this roote, did helpe and heale himselfe of the bursines in the cods, after that all phisitions had giuen him ouer, except they might cut him as they had concluded. The decoction also of this roote, and water that hath beene distilled, cleanseth the reines of grauell, prouoketh vrine, purgeth the bladder, the mouth thereof being stoppt vp with clammy humours, and is singular good to open the liuer, and all vessels of sense, life and motion. To make this water, you must take fower pound of the rindes of greene rootes: and being cut small, set them a steepe in eight pounds of malmesie, or of good wine, then distil them in a glasse limbecke in balneo Mariæ.

Wormewood is almost infinite in adimrable vertues. It produceth a braunched stalke with whitish leaues, very much cut like those of Mugwort, small yellow flowers and round seed heaped in clusters. This plant is maruellous fit for inflammations of the liuer and stomacke. It is very profitable for such as are sicke of the dropie, if they often take the leaues thereof confected in sugar. Wormewood is of restraining quality, bitter and sharpe altogether being hot, abstersiue, comfortable and drying. And therefore it purgeth downwards, and driueth into the vrine all cholericke humours. It doth most principally comfort the stomacke, and for this cause wine was made thereof called by the same name of the tops thereof is a decoction made with the roote of Dandelion, which is very good to heale the iayndise. The iuice of wormwood mixed with the kernell of a peach killeth wormes. This herbe prouoketh vrine, being taken fasting it preserueth from drunkenness, doth sharpen the appetite: it is a soueraign remedy for those that are subiect to stuffings by eating toade-skooles, if they drinke the iuice thereof, with vineger. Being taken with wine it is good against poison, with milk & bonie it is good to rub the that are troubled with the squinancie. The fume of the decoction thereof easeth paines in teeth and the eares. And being made in wine of raisins it asswageth the paine of the eies if they be annointed therewith. Being laid with oyle of Roses vpon a stomacke weakned through long sicknesse, it doth fortifie it: with figges, vineger, and meale of darnell it is good against the dropie, and for those that are grieved in their spleene. Wormwood put into chests defendeth apparell from worrne eating. There is a conserue made with a pound of the tops of this plant, and with three pounds of Sugar, which may heale an olde and despaired dropie if it bee often vsed.

Hyssop is a common plant, but worthy of great consideration, it is like a shrub sprouting many wooden branches out of the roote, of a foote and halfe high. The leaues are set euery where about the stalkes here and there, being long, hard, sweet in smell, hot in taste, and somewhat bitter. It beareth flowres one the top of the stalke of a blew colour, like eares of corne. The qualitie of Hyssop is pearcing, attenuatide, opening, and abstersiue: and therefore it hath the vertue to heate and to purifie. Being sod with figs, water, hony, and rue, and taken in drinke: it is good for inflammations of the lungs, for an old cough, difficultie of breathing, catarrhes, and for those which cannot breath except they stand still: and it is good also to kil wormes in the belly. Being beaten with salt and Cumin, it is good against biting of Serpents, if it be laid therupon with hony. It is profitable for those that are subiect to the falling sicknesse, being ministred in any sort to them. Being taken in drinke it voideth fleame, and chiefly that which is in the breast and lungs. It serueth also for Aegmatick maladies of the braine and sinewes not only to purge them but also to fortifie them. It driueth away ventositie, moueth appetite, prouoketh vrine, freeth from quakings and shakings of feuers, and sharpeneth the sight. It maintaineth good colour in one, and is good for the spleene, and against the dropie, and is singular against the squinancies, being gargarised with the decoction of figs. The oile that is made of the leaues and flowers, helpeth refrigerated or benumbed sinewes and strengthen them. In briebe the admirable vertues of this plant haue begotten this proverbe, (Hee that eateth Hyssop shall liue but too long.) But the plenty thereof that is euery where, causeth (euen as it is with all other common things) that it is made but small account of, and is very seldome vsed in Phisicke.

Sage also is verie common, so that there is no garden but is filled therewith: yet the vertue thereof is not a whit lesse, as is daily experimented, to the great profit of many. It hath many long, square, and white branches. The leaues are like those of a Quince tree, but more long, more rough, more thicke, sharpe, strong, of good smell, and yet somewhat vnplesant. Many make two kindes of Sage, common Sage and wilde Sage. But wee may note that garden sage is all one with field sage: neither can much difference bee marked in them, save in the leaues, which are thinner, whiter, and rougher in wilde then in garden sage. This plant is very singular against all cold and flegmaticke diseases in the head, and against all paines of the ioints, either beeing taken in drinke, or applied in fomentations. Wherefore it is very good for them who haue the falling disease, or are sicke of the lethargy, and for those that haue their members benumbed or senselesse. It is profitable against defluxions of fleame, and maladies in the breast. It is good for great bellied women to eate, which are subiect to trauell before their time, for euery light cause, for it keepeth the child in the wombe, and doth quicken it. If you giue three or foure ounces of the iuice of sage to them that spit blood, that they may drinke it fasting in a morning with hony, the blood wil presently be staied. The vse of sage in pottage, and otherwise serueth to sharpen the appetite, and cleanse the stomacke being full of ill humours. In summe, when occasion is to heat, dry and binde, sage is a very good and fit medicine.

their property

Mints likewise haue great properties, and are very common, both in gardens and fields. Whereof though there be many kinde (for some haue small and crisped leaues, others haue the stalke and flower red, and others white (yet is there no great matter to be made of these differences, considering that one selfe same vertue resideth in all. Mints beaten, and made into a plaister doe comfort a weake stomacke. It is a soueraigne thing to restore the smell, and feeling to those that haue lost it, so that it be often held to the nose. The leaues thereof dried, and brought into powder, kill wormes in little children. The iuice drunke with vineger, stancheth blood; with the iuice of a sower pomegranate it restraineth vomitings, hickets, and the colicke passion. Mints laid vpon the forehead asswage the head-ach, and laid vpon too tender dugs that are full of milke, it easeth the paine of them, applied with salt it is good for bitings by dogs, and with honied water it is good against paines in the eares. The water of the whole plant distilled in a glasse limbecke in a bath of hot water, and drunke to the waight of foure ounces, staieeth bleeding at nose. They that loue milke, must presently after they haue eaten thereof, chew mint leaues, to hinder the milke that it doe not curdle in their stomacke, if also you sprinkle cheese with the iuice thereof, or with the decoction thereof, it will keepe from corrupting and rottenness. Now I referre to you (A R A M) the sequele of this discourse.

Of Thyme, Sauorie, Marierom, Rue, Parsley, and Fennell.
Chapter 75.

Of Thyme and the property thereof.

A R A M. AMongst common herbes admirable in their properties, Thyme is worthy to be noted. Now there are two sorts thereof, one bearing sundrie twigs laden with very many little narrow leaues, hauing small heads, at the toppe full of purple flowres: and the other is as hard as wood, more branched, and like vnto Sauory. In property it is hot, and dry in the third degree. And therefore it prouoketh vrine, doth heate and being taken in drinke doth purge the intrailes. It is good to make one spit out the ill humours of the lungs, and in the breast. Foure drams of drie Thyme puluerized, being ministred fasting to one that hath the gout, with two ounces and a halfe of honied vinegar, doth profit them very much: for it purgeth choler, and other sharpe humours. It is good also for diseases of the bladder: and the waight of a dramme being taken with a spoonefull of honied water, it is good for such as beginne to haue a swollen belly: for the Sciatica, and paine in the reines, in the sides, and in the breast, for inflations and stiches about the forepart of the belly, for melancholy persons; for those that are troubled in minde, and are in continuall fearefulness, if three drams be giuen to them fasting with a spoonefull of honied vinegar it will doe them much good. It is profitable also against inflammation of the eies, and vehement paines thereof, and against the gout in the feete, being taken with wine. The vse thereof is very good for them that haue but badde sight. Out of thyme there is an oyle extracted of the colour of gold, which commeth forth with the water, when the herbe being fresh and greene is distilled in a bathe of hote water. This oyle smells like a Citron, & is very tart in tast, and good for all things, which haue need to be heated. But we must note that heede must be taken, that to all the foresaid purposes black thyme be not vsed: for it corrupteth the temperature of the person, & ingendreth choler.

And

And therefore that thimemust be chosen, which beareth a carnation flower, and that for the best yet which beareth a white flower.

Sauory also is an herbe knowne vnto all, and hath the same properties and vertues which thyme hath; beeing taken in such manner. There are two kindes thereof: one is like to thyme, somewhat lesse and more tender, bearing a buddefull of greene flowers enclining to purple. The other is greater and more branched, which is often founde in gardens having many boughes that spread about it, beeing round and woody. The leaues thereof are greater then those of thyme, somewhat strong and harder, which doe heere and there grow about the branches in bunches together, after the springing whereof there grow out little buddees enuironed with leaues, which are much lesse then the other, wherein grow small carnation flowers. The leaues and flowers of sauory beeing made in a garland or chaplet, and set vpon the head of such as sleepe, doe waken them. Being vsed in a caraplasme with wheat meale, sodde together in wine, it is very auailable against grieues of the Sciatica. But the vse of sauory is chiefly good for healthfull persons, whether it bee in pottage, or in sauce, or otherwise. And it being dried in the shade, and brought into powder, may be vsed instead of spices, and so may thyme and marierom, with marvellous profit for health: and strange drugs that are hurtfull may be spared, as pepper and ginger are, being commonly vsed.

Of Sauory.

Marierom is so good for all persons, so that there are but few people which haue it not, eyther in their gardens, or in earth pottes: the whole plant is odoriferous, and most profitable in phisicke. It is branched with small plyable twigges, with long whitish and hairy leaues growing about those twigges. It beareth flowers in great number on the toppe of the stalkes, and buddees of the colour of the herbe, beeing long, and composed of an heape of scales, well compact together, out of which groweth a little graine. In property it resolueth, and is attenuatiue, opening and corroboratiue. It is excellent against all cold diseases of the head, and of the sinewes, both outwardly applyed and taken in drinke: as also for grieues in the eares, noise in them, and difficult hearing, if some of the iuice of the leaues thereof bee dropt into them. The iuice thereof also being snuffed vp into the nose, purgeth the steame of the head, cleanseth the braine, and fortifieth it. The vse of this plant and of the decoction thereof, is good against all euill in the breast, which may stoppe the free course and recourse of breath. It is profitable for them that are diseased in the liuer, and in the spleene: not onely freeing the liuer and spleene from oppilations and stoppings; but also making them strong and found. The decoction thereof also being drunke, is good in the beginning of a dropisie, for difficulty in making water, and for pulling in ones belly. And the leaues thereof serue against the stings of scorpions, being laid thereupon with salt and vineger.

Of Marierom

Rue likewise by reason of the great and exquisite properties thereof deserueth to be remembred. This plant is alwaies greene, very thicke of iuicie leaues, many hanging at one stalke of small growth, but very broad, of a darke greene colour. It produceth many little boughes and branches, and on the top yellow flowres; out of which grow little heads diuided into foure parts, wherein small blacke seede is inclosed. This herbe is very attenuatiue, incisive, digestiue, resolutiue, prouocatiue, and driueth out ventosities very forceably. For it is hot in the third degree, and not onely sharpe in taste but bitter also: by meanes whereof it may resolue and penetrate grosse and clammy humours; and through the same qualities prouoke vrine. It doth also consist of subtile parts and is numbered amongst medicines, which drie greatly: and therefore it is good against inflations, aswaging the appetite of lust, it resolueth and freeth from all windines. The seede thereof drunke in wine, to the weight of fiftene ounces, is a singular remedy against all poyson. The leaues eaten alone fasting, or with nuts and drie figs, doe kill the power of venom, and are good against Serpents. The decoction thereof drunke is profitable against paines in the breast and in the sides, inflammation of the liuer, the gout, and shakings of agues; being eaten rawe or confected, it cleareth the sight, is good against difficultie in breathing, and against the cough: being mixed with French Cherries dried, it allaieth paines of the eies; being mixed with oyle of Roses and Vineger, it easeth the headache; being brayed and put into the nose, it stancheth the bleeding thereof. The distilled water of it, infused into an equall portion of wine and Rose water, is soueraigne for the paine in the eies.

Of Rue.

Parsley is ordinarie and common in all gardens, and the vse thereof great and very commodious commodious for the mouth and stomacke. Neither is there any herbe more vsed in meats, and in sauces. But it hath many properties in phisicke, for which it is much to bee commended. For the decoction of the leaues or rootes therof openeth the passage of vrine, and purgeth out grauell that hath long laine in the vrine conduits: it easeth the colick & paines in the raines, being vsed in manner of fomentation vpon the grieued parts. The seed therof is yet of greater vertue in the foresaid effects: it serueth (being drunke) against venime of serpents, and driueth out ventosities. The often vsage of parsley doth take away stinking of breath, being applied in a cataplasme with crums of white bread it healeth tetters, as it waggerth the swelling of the dugs, & for women in child bed doth diminish their milk. There is also another kind of parsley called marsh parsley, commonly named (broad smillage) which hath as much or more efficacy in phisick then the other: especially the seed therof, which hath most singular vses. Which being sharpe with great bitternes, is hotte in operation, with a pearling vertue. Wherefore it is good for wringings in the belly, windines of stomacke, and for the colicke: it is singular in drinke, for paines in the sides, in the raines, and in the bladder.

Of fennell.

Fennell doth also consist of two sorts, one is of set fennell, and the other wild fennell. Garden or set fennell is very pleasant in taste, for the sauiory sweetnes therof, and is profitable being vsed in phisick. The decoction of the leaues serue greatly for paines in the raines being drunk, and prouoketh. The herbe of fennell eaten, or the seed sodden with barley water doth make very much milke come into womens breasts. The roote braied and applied with hony, healeth the biting of dogs. The seed is excellent to suppress wind, being taken after meales, though it be of hard digestion, and doth but badly nourish the body. But fennell is most principally good, both the leaues and seed therof, to cleere the sight, and therefore some presse out the iuice of the leaues, and tender stalks, which they preserue & keepe for this purpose. And they do also distill the water thereof for the same vse. In the western part of Spaine the fennell yeeldeth a licour like unto gum, which is of greater efficacy then the iuice thereof in medicines for the eyes. Wilde fennell is sharper in taste, hath greater leaues, and groweth higher, then garden fennell. The root thereof hath a good sent, and being taken in drinke doth profit them much that hardly make water: it is good against bitings of serpents, breaketh the stone, and healeth the iaudise, which the seed thereof doth likewise. Now (ACHITOB) doe you proceede in talke concerning simples.

Of Rosemary, Cammomill, the Lilly, Baulme of grasse or dogs tooth, and of Pimpernell. Chap. 76.

Of Rosemary, and the admirable propertie thereof.

ACHITOB. I T would be very hard to finde out in one plant onely more vertues and properties, then they who haue travelled to publish the science of simples, haue attributed to rosemary, and yet it seemeth to many that it is fit for nothing but to make garlands and nosegayes, and being so very common, is not esteemed to be of great efficacy. Indeepe it is a very ordinary plant, and in Prouence it groweth to such greatnesse, that the people vse it for fire fewell like other wood: and the stocke is of such compasse, that they make tables and harpes thereof: Yet all this lets not, but it may be of admirable vertue. For it is very good against cold diseases of the stomacke, against the colicke, and casting vp of meate, by eating it either in bread, or drinking it in powder with pure wine. It is profitable for such as are diseased in the liuer or spleene: for it doth not onely heat, purifie and open, but through the restraining vertue thereof it doth also fortifie. It is very good against all rheumes, and all cold maladies, against the falling enill, numbnesse of members, the Lethargie and Palsie. It is good to wash the head, and for fomentations of the ioints. It doth sharpen the sight, sweaten the breath, and being boiled in vineger and hard wine, it slaieth the rheumes that fall into the teeth and gums, if the mouth be washed with this decoction hot. The powder therof dried doth consolidate greene wounds, if they be washed before with wine wherein Rosemarie hath bene sodden, and then the powder be throwed on afterwards. The flowers thereof confected in sugar, are good for all things aforelaid, particularly against cold passions of the heart, against maladies of the breast, and against the plague. The decoction of rosemary made in water, and taken in drinke doth heale the iaudise. So likewise doth the seede being drunke with with pepper and white wine. In the plague time it is good to perfume the house with this plant, for the fume thereof drieth away all aires.

Cammomell also groweth abundantly amongst corne, and in the fieldes, bearing yellow flowers environed with whitish leaves, and is of a strong savour. But to mollifie, Of Cammo- mill. solve, rarifie, and ipesen, this plant is of singular operation: And in this respect no medicine is better for wearie folkes then a bath of cammomell. The leaves beaten, and put into white wine make a profitable drinke, to heale quotidian and quarton agues: the decoction thereof drunke healeth paines in the side; and so doth the water distilled of the flowers being gathered without leaves, beaten in a mortar, and formed with oile into trochisks, afterwards dissolved againe in oyle, if they be therewith rubbed and chafed, which are troubled with fevers, from the crowne of the head to the foote, and that they presently go into bed to sweate, they shall be holpen, because of the abundant heate that goeth out of their body. Cammomill is especially good to dissolve fevers that are without inflammation of any chiefe in traile, principally those which proceede from cholericke humours and thickenesse of the skinne. Being taken in drinke, or the fume thereof received in at the fundament, it is a great helpe to voide vrine and grauell.

The lillie is likewise very worthy of consideration. It beareth long leaves, ever greene, smooth, and ioyce; it hath a stalke of two cubits high, round, straight, even, thicke, and strong all clad with leaves from the bottome to the top. At the top of the stalke grow three or fower little branches, out of which issue small long heads of the colour of the herbe, which in time become faire Lillies of exquisite whitenesse, crossed on the outside, and the endes turned outwards round about. At the bottome of the flower grow certaine yellow stalks, as it were dally on the vpper side, of the fashio of tongues, out of the midls of which groweth one long one, having a round head of the colour of the herbe. There is no flower so high, and it surpasseth in beauty all other whitenesse. Now for the vertue of this plant. The leaves thereof are good being applyed against the biting of serpents, being boiled they heale burpiings, and confectioned in vineger, are good for wounds: water distilled of the flowers, are profitable for women that are delivered of child with great difficultie, and voideth out the after burthen, being mixed with safforne, and Cinamon. The oyle drawne out of those flowers is good against all cold diseases of the sinewes, as cramps, and palsies, and to mollifie all stiffnesse in the ioynts, and all hard-swollen kernels. Lillies long time steeped in oile, being applied hot, do ripen hot impostumes without paine, and do breake them, especially such as are in the ioynts. And the body of the roots hath the same propertie. For being boiled, and braied with hony they heale cut and lame sinewes, cleanse the head of scabs, and clarifie the visage, and make it smooth. The seede of Lillies also taken in drinke, serveth against the bitings of serpents. And the water that is distilled of the flowers in a limbecke doth take wrinkles out of womens faces, and doth beautifie them very much.

Baulme is a very odoriferous plant, and smelleth much like a Citron: the stalke and leave Of Baulme. thereof are somewhat rough, and many stalkes issue out of the roote. The propertie of it is to reioyce the heart, to comfort cold and moist stomacks, to helpe digestion, to evacuate the stoppings of the conduits of the braine, to heale feeblenesse and faintnesse of heart, to fortifie it being weake, especially if the weakenes be such that it oftentimes breaketh ones sleepe in the night: moreover this herbe staith the panting of the heart, drieth away cares and sad imaginations which proceede either from the melancholie humour, or from fleame combust. It hath also a laxative vertue, not so feeble, but that it cleanseth and purgeth the spirits, and bloud of the heart and arteries, from all melancholie vapors: which cannot do to the other parts of the body. The leaves thereof taken in drinke, or outwardly applied, are good against stingings of Tarantula, of Scorpions, and against the biting of dogs: and it is good to bath such wounds with the decoction thereof. Being mixed with salt, they are profitable against the Kings euill, and mundise vlcers: and being applyed, doe assuage the paine of gowts. They are vsed in clysters against the flux. Also the leaves taken in drinke with Niter, are very good for them that are stopped by eating toad stooles, or mushrums: and in loch for them that are troubled with shrinking vp of the belly, and breath with such difficultie, that they cannot doe it except they stand vpright.

Grasse, or Dogs tooth is one of the commonest herbes in the field, yea even in leane grounds. The branches thereof lye along vpon the earth, and are full of knots, out of Of Dogs tooth. which, and out of the top it often sendeth new rootes. The leaves are very smal and pointed it is maruailous in property. For the decoction thereof taken in drinke, healeth wringing in the bellie, and hard making of water, and breaketh the stone and grauell in the bladder. The root braied and applied, searcheth wounds. And the iuice of the decoction thereof may bee vsed to the same effect: which the herbe also doth, beeing beaten, and keepeth wounds from all inflammation: if to the decoction thereof bee put a little wine, or hony, and the third part of so much Pepper, Myrrh, and Franckincense, and bee made to boile afterwards againe in some copper vessel; it is a singular remedy for the tooth-ach, and the rheume which falleth into the eies, Graisse also that hath seuen spaces betwixt the knots, is very good for the headach beeing bound about it. It likewise stauncheth bleeding at nose. The seede thereof doth greatly prouoke vrine, and bindeth the bellie, and staeth vomiting. It is special good against byting of Dragons. There is found in some places of Germany a certaine kinde of graisse, which is tilled with as great care, as other corne, or pulse, because the people vseth the seede thereof in their meates, which seede they call (Mama) and they seeth it in pottage with fat meate, and finde it as good as Rice. It is smaller then millet, and very white. But it must bee beaten in a morter, to vnhuske it.

Of Pimper-
nel.

There are three sorts of Pimpernell. One groweth very great, and hath a long root, the leaves are couched round vpon the earth, beeing cut and indented about: the stalke is square, the flowers thicke in bunches, small and whitish. The next sort is little, and hath a red stalke; the leaves small, not so much cut, and thinner dented. The third kinde is the most common, which is often eaten in sallades, and set in gardens. The root of the two first kindes (wherein all their vertue lieth) is very good for paines in the reines, and bladder, which are caused by the stone. For it cleereth the reines of grauell, and driueth forth long kept vrine. The iuice also of this root being drunke with wine, is singular against all poisons, and bitings of venemous beasts. For which cause some esteeme much of this root, to be vsed against the plague. The third kinde of Pimpernell is different in vertue from the former, although they be very like in forme of leaves. For it is more restraining in taste and verie nourishing; for which cause it may be thought to be of a binding nature. Wherefore it stayeth the Dysenteria and other fluxes, and the vomiting of cholericke humours. It healeth wounds and vlcers, and it is of speciall vse in oyntments that are made for wounds in the head, and for cankers. Some phisitions haue much commended it in the cure of pestilent and contagious feuers; affirming also that the often vsage thereof is a soueraigne preservative against dangerous diseases. Now (A S E R.) do you proceede in this our treatise concerning simples.

Of Night shade, Alkakeng, Pellitorie of the wall, Fumitorie, Angelica, and of Maidens haire. Chapter. 77.

Of nightshade and the properties
thereof.

A S E R. I T is wonderfull to rehearse the vertues and properties, which many affirme to vs in their writings to consist in the Solanum, whereof the Ancients made fower kindes. But I will heere make mention of two onely, which are very common, sith that the rest are seldome found or neuer. The first kinde is called Night shade, which is a small little herbe, hauing many pits in the stalkethereof, out of which grow blacke leaves like to those of Basil, but a little greater. It beareth white flowers, yealow in the midsts, in fashion of a starre. The fruite thereof is round, hanging in clusters, full of a winie iuice, no lesse then Iuniper seede, wherein a small white graine is enclosed: this fruite is of diuers colours; for in some plants it is blacke, in others yealow, and in some enclining towards a greene. Concerning the propertie of this plant, the iuice of the fruite thereof, as likewise of the leaves mixed with oyle of Roses, and a little vineger, is singular against the headach, when it is caused by heate. It is good for such as are franticke, if one sleepe linnen clothes therein, and lay them to the forepart of their head. In like sort may they bee applied to the forehead against hot rheumes that fall downe into the eies. It is good also to gargle it against inflammations of the throate, and falling of the pallat. It is put in ointments to heale sore and grievous vlcers. The leaves thereof beaten with salt, and laid on a plaister, breake impostumes that grow behinde the eares. In briebe, when need is to refresh, to drie vp, or to restraine, night shade is very conuenient.

Now for the other kinde of Solanum, commonly called Alkakeng, it hath leaves like

vnto Nightshade, but broader, stronger, somewhat sharpe, and not so blacke: the stalke thereof is supple, which being growne vp enclineth towards the ground. The flowers are white, out of which rise little bladders as bigge as a nut, and growe sharpe: they are composed of eight sides, of equall distance one from another. And, they are first greene, and being ripe, red: within them they containe fruite one graine in each of them, beeing fastened to the bottome of the bladder, like to the seede of a red grape, both sharpe and bitter and full of a great number of small white graines within. In this fruite also is great vertue, not onely to prouoke vrine, but also to allay the burning heat thereof. For the iuice of it being drunke with the iuice of white poppie, or of the seede of Melons, or of Gourds, or with the decoction of Mallowes, or with barley water, is maruailous singular for the scorching heate of vrine. And this plant is so contrary to adders, that laying the roote therof neere vnto them, they are sodainely surprised with so great sleepe, that they die therewith. The fruite thereof steeped in new wine is very good being laid on the eie lids. Some put it in a vessell together with ripe grapes, which they suffer to boyle for certaine daies together, out of which they extract a very profitable wine, for such as are troubled with grauell: euacuating the grauell maruailously wel, and clensing the reins being drunke to the waight of fower ounces. And the same fruite taken in the drinke healeth the iauundice.

Of Alkakeng
and the vertue thereof.

Pellitorie is an herbe very well knowne, and hath many great properties, the leaues thereof are rough, the stalke redde, about which are bitter graines, which are fit to lay amongst apparell. This plant hath the vertue to refresh and binde, for which cause it is singular good to heale greene wounds. For it be laide vpon a wound (being halfe beaten and very fresh) and be not taken off for three dayes together, there shall be no neede to vse any other medicine. The waight of three ounces of the iuice thereof being drunke, is maruailous good to free vrine that hath long beene holden: and the herbe heated vpon a tile, and sprinkled with Malmesey, and applied to the forehead, is very good for such as are troubled with grauell, and cannot make water. The iuice thereof held within the mouth healeth the toothach. The distilled water thereof clenseth and clarifieth the visage: the leaues being applied, heale burnings, swellings, and inflammations, beeing fried with fresh butter, or capons grease, and laid in a manner of a ferge-cloth vpon the belly, they ease collicke. A cataplasme also made of greene pellitorie beaten with crums of bread, and oyle of roses or cammomell, resolueth impostumes which grow in the dugs. And being mixed with goates grease, or kids grease, it is good for gouts and fals. The iuice likewise mixed in like quantitie of white wine, and oyle of sweete almonds being newly made, alayeth the paines and torments of the stone, and dropped into the eares with the oyle of roses, it healeth the pain of them. Some minister them to gargle for inflammation in the throat. And some giue them for an old cough. It is seene by experience that this herbe is abstersiue, in so much as it is verie good to expell wormes.

Of Pellitory.

Fumitory is an herbe much branched and tender, hauing very small leaues growing here and there, of a white ashie colour, and in great number vpon euery side. The flowers thereof is purple. This plant is one of the most gentle medicines, and least annoying, that may be amongst laxatiue remedies. But it is euery where so common that none esteeme of it. It is not onely laxatiue, but doth also fortifie the inferiour members, bindeth their veines which are too loose, as also those of the stomacke, and of the liuer, and healeth feuers that proceede by choler, or through stoppings. It euacuateth the cholerike humour verie much in vrine: the seede thereof is bitter and somewhat sharpe: and it is somewhat more hot, then the herbe that is temperate: so that the whole plant is purifying, penetratiue, opening and laxatiue. And because of the colde and stipticke quality thereof it bindeth, restraineth and fortifieth. It doth gently loosen the bellic, it purgeth choler and burning humours. Wherefore it is good against the meazels, against cankers, and all infections of the skinne, and other maladies which doe proceede from oppilations: the iuice thereof cleareth the sight, and causeth teares to issue even as smoake or fume doth, whereof it seemeth to haue taken name.

Of Fumitory

Angelica is a most excellent plant, and very worthy to be here described. It is aboue a cubit in height, it produceth a knottie stalke, crested, and full of pits, the leaues thereof are long, and indented round about, the flowers white growing in bunches out of which springeth a little graine, and smooth like a lentill. The root is as thicke as a reddish, diuided into many branches, sharpe in taste, and sweete in smell. Also there are sundry sorts thereof: for one kinde is set in gardens, another sort is wilde, and another groweth in watry places.

Of Angelica

And

All this plant is hot and drie in the second degree full, or to the beginning of the third: Wherefore it is opening, attenuating, and resoluing. It is singular against poysons: so that taken in drinke, or often chewed, it preserveth from the plague; being taken alone, it attenuateth flegmaticke and clammy humours. And so doth the decoction of the roote thereof, which doth readily heale the cough that comes through colde: for it causeth one to spit out and voide all clammy fleame. The same decoction received in wine or water, healeth vlcers in the interior members, dissolueth clotted blood, and fortifieth the stomacke. The roote beaten to powder is soueraigne against fainting of the heart and other passions thereof. It is singular against bitings of mad and venemous beasts; being laide therevpon with Rue, or taken inwardly: for which cause many of our moderne phisitions imploy it in their counterpoisons and preseruatives. There is given halfe a dram of the roote, with a dram of treacle, and the distilled water hereof, to such as haue the plague, who are constrained to sweat; and seauen howers after to resumethis drinke: and by this onely counterpoison some haue bene holpen. This roote chewed, and put into holow teeth asswageth the paine of them. It also sweetneth the breath. Whosoever shall hold a little peece thereof in his mouth, or in the morning drinke two spoonefulls of wine wherein it hath bin steeped, hee shall not easily bee infected with euill aire all day after. The leaues thereof with the leaues of Rue and hony, applyed in a cataplasme, heale the bitings of mad dogs, and stingings of serpents. And being layde vpon his head that is sicke of an ague, it attracteth to it selfe much of the heate of the ague.

Of Maiden-
haire.

Maidenhaire also is a very exquisite plant; much like vnto ferne, but with smaller leaues, set in order heere and there one ouer against another, in fine small branches, sharpe in taste, blacke and shining. It is temperate in heate and coldnesse; and therefore it drieth, purifieth, & resolueth: It is good to cause one to spit and void out of the brest and lungs, al grosse and clammy humours. It staith the fluxe of the bellie, resolueth the kings euill, and other tumours, and being taken in drinke is singular for hardnesse of water, when one can make it but drop by drop, and it breaketh the stone. The decoction also thereof is good for them that draw their breath with paine, and is profitable for the spleene, and against the the iaudise. And the herbe thereof being laide vpon the bitings of serpents, is a singular remedie therefore. To open also the infulsion thereof made in parsley water, or in endiue water, or in broth of blacke chich pease, or in a little goats milke, is very good: & adding sugar thereto, it healeth inflammations of the side, and doth greatly prouoke vrine. Briefly all the vertues that Phisitions attribute to Venus haire called commonly (Capilli Veneris) agree with Maidenhaire. Now (A M A N A) let vs heare you choose out other plants for the subiect of your discourse.

Of Rheubarb, Licorice, Aloes, Sene, Saffron and Centurie.

Chapter 78.

Of Rheubarb, and the excellent vertue
thereof.

A M A N A. Sith that it is not our purpose to write an entire Historie concerning simples, but onely to consider of the most excellent in their effects, me seemeth that it is sufficient for vs (so to make way to another matter) to adde to our precedent discourses, that which I intend now to speake concerning some singular plants: amongst wich I preferre Rheubarb to the first place, which is very plentiful in all India. The leaues of it are commonly two foote long, broad aboue, and so growing narrower towards the stalke, hauing a certaine cotton or (at it were) haire round about it, as is commonly seene in the herbe called in French Bouillon blanc. The stalke thereof is but a foote high, or little more, and is all greene like the leaues. In the middle thereof groweth out a very small branch, hauing certaine flowers about it that enuiron it, which are like vnto purple violets saue in colour onely, which is different being white and blew, of sharpe smell, and very vnpleasant to their nose that smell thereat. The roote is very deepe in the ground, of a foote and an halfe long, and as thicke as a mans arme, some more, some lesse; and out of it there do many small ones sprout, which (before the great one bee cut) are digged vp with the principall, to the end that it may more easily bee cleft in peeces. It is on the out side of an ashie colour, and full of yellowish iuice, while it is fresh and greene, and so clammy, that in touching thereof it causeth the fingers to sticke together. Now this roote is an excellent medicine, gentle, and without danger, wherein many singularities requisite in a laxative simple are comprised. And Rheubarb is best while it is greene, of a blackish colour, some what enclining to a redde, and heauy, although it be of a rare body, and which being broken, is mixed with radde and skie colour within: and being chewed waxeth as yealow as Saffron. Besides it purgeth choler and flemme: it clenseth and fortifieth the stomacke and liuer, and healeth the paines and prickings of them. It clarifieth the blood, openeth and healeth all maladies that proceede of stoppings, as the iaudise, the dropisie, smelling of the spleene, and long feauers. It is good against spitting of blood, and slancheth it, out of what part soeuer it run. And it may be taken at all times without danger, and in all ages, yea it may be ministered to little children, and to great bellied women: although the vulgar people thinke otherwise, supposing that Rheubarb is a very violent medicine, and that Phisitions vse it but in halfe despaired maladies: which is not so.

Licorice is very worthie to be numbred amongst the most excellent Phisicke plants. Of Licorice.
And thereof are two kinds, one bearing fruite, and the other not: that which beareth fruite groweth abundantly in Germanie, and in the territorie of Bamberg and other places. And it is a very branchie plant, of two cubits high, being thicke of leaues, and fatte in manner of gumme: the flowers thereof are like an Hyacinth: the fruite thereof great like plantine berries, and more rough and hairie, enclosed within little cods, like those of lentiles, hairie also and full of small prickles, of yellow colour enclining to a blacke. The other kind of Licorice is very well knowne, and groweth of it selfe in many places. In vertue it is astringent, cleansing, and alaieth the bitterness of humours: and therefore it is very good for heate of the vrine. Being chewed, especially whilest it is fresh, it slancheth hunger and thirst, and retayneth that vertue for many dayes. And the iuice thereof being made thicke and held in the mouth, till it melt of it selfe, hath the same effect. It is good for the breast and lungs, and is therefore ministered to those who haue short breath, or are in a consumption or plurisie. The iuice allwageth the prickings, not onely of the arterie of the lungs but of the bladder also: and doth excellently staunch thirst, as being tempered with moisture, and colder then our nature. And it is to be noted, that the roote wherein lye all these properties is much better being fresh taken out of the ground, then when it is drie, and is more pleasant in taste being employed in medicines.

The Aloe is a plant, which is seene greene in many townes in Italy, in windows, and galleries: it is kept in pots full of earth, more for pleasure to content the eie, then for vse in medicine. But the licour and iuice that is pressed out of it and brought to vs, is extracted out of the Aloe that groweth in the lower Syria, and Arabia, and in the Indies, where the best is. This plant hath thick and fat leaues, with certaine little prickles here and there on all sides. The roote thereof is fat and oilie, bearing a white flower, out of which groweth a little graine, like that of Smalage. In the thicke iuice thereof prepared for medicine there is found grauel and earth, which is nothing but the seedlings of pure Aloes, but the good is pure and cleane, not sophisticate, without grauel, or little stones, reddish, brittle, of a good smell, close like a liuer, & very much enclining to the colour thereof, easily melting, and very bitter, that which is black, and hard to breake is worth nothing. The Aloe is profitable for many things because of the drines thereof without any sharpnes. It purgeth choler and flemme, the head, and stomacke, and is very good for paines in those parts, it quickeneth all the senses, openeth the liuer, and healeth the laundise. It killeth wormes in the belly, being incorporated with oxe gall, and vineger, and laid vpon the nauell. Some apply the powder thereof to wounds to seach them; it healeth vlcers, and stayeth them. It appeaseth the paine of the head, being applied to the temples, and forehead with vineger, and oyle of roses. In briebe the propertie thereof is to restrain, to drie, to prouoke sleepe, to binde the bodie, and yet to loosen the belly.

Sene hath leaues like Licorice, thicke, fat, and in taste like Beanes: the stalke thereof Of Sene.
is a cubit high, out of which issue many branches as pliable as a leatherne thong. The flowers thereof are yealow, straked with small purple strakes; after which there grow certaine cods crooked like a sickle, wherein is inclosed a blacke seed, enclining to greene, very like to kernels in grapes. It is sowed in diuers places in Florence, and prospereth very well, especially in the territorie of the citie of Florence; but the best is brought from Alexandria in Egypt, and out of Syria. It purgeth without any annoyance, choler, flemme, and melancholy. It mundifieth the heart, the liuer, the brain, the spleene, the lungs, and all parts of the body, and is profitable for all the accidents of them. It openeth the inner parts, and maintaineth a man or woman in youth, for sloweth age, and causeth ioy of minde. The leaues thereof are good to wash the head with cammomill; for they fortifie the braine, the sinewes, the sight, and the hearing. Briefly it is a good medicine in all long diseases, and such as proceede of a melancholy humour. And therefore it is very profitable for them that raue, and are out of their wits: likewise for vlcers ouer all the body, for palsies, for the head ach, falling euill. It fortifieth the heart especially, being mixed with some other ingredient fit therefore, as namely with purple violets. It is very good in the infusion or decoction thereof to adde some cloues thereto, to correct a little that annoiance, which some say it doth to the stomach, and to fortifie the vertue thereof. And being mixed with some infusion of roses, or laxatiue sirup of roses, it is an excellent purge for all euill humours. There is a siruppe made of Sene, being taken Greene from the plant, and mixed with infusion of roses, which is very good to that effect: and is so gentle that one many minister thereof to women with childe, and to little infants, and people of all ages.

Of Saffron.

Saffron is a common plant, and yet hath many vertues. It beareth many leaues, long, narrow, smal, full, not round, hanging downewards, thicke, and soft. The flower thereof is skie coloured, & very faire to behold. Out of the middle thereof grow certaine red threedes, big at the top: with which out of the same place almost, there grow other yealow ones in fashion like tongues. That Saffron is good, which dieth your hands with the colour thereof, and that smelleth somewhat sharpe, and is not very brittle. In propertie it is good for feebleness of stomacke, and faintness of heart, being taken in some small quantitie; it preserueth from drunkenness, and healeth the bitings of serpents, and stinging of spiders. It is restorative, the astriction thereof very much aiding thereto: which qualitie proceedeth from cold and earthines, although that the qualitie of heat exceede therein: in such sort as in all the substance thereof, it is hot in the second degree, and dry in the first. But the smell thereof is naught for the head, and being taken too much it troubleth the spirit.

Of Century.

Centurie is likewise worthy of great consideration, because of the properties thereof in phisicke. There be two sorts of it, one is called great Centurie, and the other is lesser Centurie. The great hath leaues like a walnut tree, long, green like Colewoorts, indented about, a stalke of two or three cubits high. The flower thereof is blew, and the roote very big, full of iuice, sharpe with astriction and sweeteness. The lesser sort hath leaues like rue, a square stalke, somewhat more then a span long, the flowers thereof are red, inclining to purple; and the roote is small, smooth and bitter in taste. For their properties, the vertue of great Centurie consisteth in the roote thereof, which serueth for ruptures, convulsions, difficultie in breathing, old coughes, pleurisies, and spitting of blood. It is also given to them that are sicke of the drop sic, of the iaudise, and are pained in their liuer, being either steeped in wine or beaten to powder, and drunke. Of the lesser, Galen hath composed an whole booke, which he dedicated to his friend Papias, concerning the great and admirable vertues therein. For it purgeth choler and fleame, for which cause the decoction thereof is good against tertian fevers; which also, and the iuice thereof helpeth stoppings and hardness of the liuer and spleene. Being drunke likewise to the waight of a dram with honie, or laide vpon the navel, it auoideth wormes out of the belly. The leaues of this herbe, wherein, and in the flowers thereof lyeth all the vertue, being applied fresh to greene wounds, search them, and heales vp olde vlcers. But now changing our talke, let vs leaue phisicke plants, and say somewhat concerning those more excellent ones, which particularly serue for the nouriture of Man.

Of Wheate, Rye, Barley, and Oates: and of Rice, and Millet. Chapter 79.

ARAM. Amongst herbes and plants, wherewith men are fed and nourished, the chiefe degree is by good right assigned to Wheat, as to that graine wherof the best bread is made, which onely with water, may very well suffice for the maintenance of our life: having many properties also in the vse of Phisicke. Now according to the diuersitie of places wherein it groweth people doe name it; and one sort differeth from another; but wee will heere speake of that which is most common amongst vs. All Wheate hath many many very small rootes, but one leafe, and many buddes, which may diuide themfelues into sundry branches. All the winter time it is an herbe, but the weather waxing milder, there springeth out of the middest thereof a small stalke, which after three or foure knots or ioyns, beareth an eare, not by and by seene, but is hidden within a case. The stalk being made, the flower bloometh some foure or fife daies after, and about so long endureth. That past, the graine swelleth, and ripeneth in forty daies, or sooner, as the climate is in heat. The fertility of this plant is marueilous; as we behold by daily experience. For there are some places in Italy especially in the tetrity of Sienna; about the sea coasts, where there hath bene seene to grow out of one onely graine foure and twenty eares of corne, and that one bushell of seede hath yielded an hundred. The best wheat should bee hard to breake, massiue, waighy, of the colour of gold, cleere, smooth, and kept 3. moneths, ripe, faire, and growing in a fat soile, to be the fitter to make better bread of. And the meale also must not be too much ground, neither yet too fresh, nor too long kept before it bee vsed, for if it bee too much ground, it maketh bread as if it were of branne; that which is too fresh doth yet retaineth therein some heat of the millstone: and that which is kept too long will be spoiled either by dust, or by mouldines, or else will haue some bad smell. Now besides the common vse of wheat, the matter how to make it in drinke is very notable, which drinke serueth in stead of wine in those countries, where the vine cannot fructifie. For there they take wheat, and sometimes barley, rie, or oates, every one apart, or else two or three sorts of these graines, or else all mingled together, and steepe them in fountaine water, or in water of the cleaneft and cleereft riuer that may be chosen: or else for better in a decoction or wourt of hops, and this is done for so long time till the graine beginne to breake: then is it dried in the sunne: being dry, it is beaten, or else ground; afterwards sodden in water, in which it hath first bene steeped for the space of three or foure howers; putting thereto a good quantity of the flowers of hops, and skimming the decoction or wourt very well: that done, it is powred out, and put in vessels for the purpose. This drinke is called Beere. And they which will haue it very pleasant to the taste after it is made; doe cast into the vessels sugar, Cinamon, and Cloues, and then stirre it very much. Some doe put cockle into the composition of beere, the more to sharpen the taste. And sith we are entred into this speech, wee will here note, that wheat doth easily conuert into cockle: chiefly when the weather is rainy and cold, for it commeth of corne corrupted by too much moisture, or that hath bene too much wette by continuall raine in winter. It springeth first out of the ground, hauing a long leafe, fat, and rough, with a slenderer stalke then that of wheat, at the top whereof there is a long eare, hauing on all sides little sharp cods or husks, out of which three or foure graines grow together being couered with a very hard barke. The bread that hath much thereof in it doth dizzie and hurt the head, so that they which eate thereof do commonly fall into a sound sleep, and their head is much troubled. It annoyeth the eies & dims the sight. Some also do make (* Amylum) of wheate, which serueth for many things. They take very cleane wheat of three moneths old, which they wet fife times a day, and as often by night, if it be possible, being wel soaked and steeped, they powre the water away, not shaking it, to the end that the thicke, and that which is like creame may not runne out with the water. After that it is verie well mollified, and the water changed, it must bee sifted, that the branne which swimmeth at top thereof may bee done away, and then must it be kneaded very hard together, calling fresh water still vpon it. And so must it be laid in panniers or dossers to drie, and then vpon new tiles to bee parched in the sunne, with as much speed as may be: for if it remaine neuer so little a while moyst, it waxeth sowre. The best is that which is white, fresh, light and smoothe. It hath power to mollifie in sharpe and rough things: and is good against rheumes that fall into the eyes. Being taken in drinke, it restraineth spitting of blood, and allwageth the sorenesse of the throat.

Of wheat, & of the forme and fertility thereof.

Beere.

Of Cockle.

* As some thinke water cakes.

Of Rie.

Of Barley.

Next after Wheat, Rie is in common vse to make bread of. This plant hath many stalks smaller then those of Wheate, and blacker, as the graine is also. Meale made of Rye, is good for plaisters to drawe. The decoction of the seed voideth wormes out of the belly, especially if Coriander seed be mixed therewith. The straw being soked in water, is good to bind instead of rush or broome.

Barley is also much vsed every where. It beareth a broad leafe, and rougher then wheat, and hath a britler & lesser stalke of eight knots, with one only rough broad leafe vpon the stalk. The grain is lapped in a cod, which is close shut: out of the top whereof groweth a long and sharpe beard. The best is that which is whitest, most full, heavy, easie to boyle, not waxing mouldy. There groweth a certaine kinde of it in many places; the graine whereof is easily taken out of the huske or codde, and is therefore called clesed barley. Besides, all barley drieth and cooleth, and is also abstersive. The meale thereof boyled in honied water with figs, resolueth all inflammations and impostumes: with rosin and pigeons dung, it ripeneth all hard swellings: with melilot & heads of poppie, it easeth the paine of the sides: and with quinces or vineger, it appeaseth inflammations of the goute in the feete. The ashes of burnt barley is very good for burnings being laide thereupon, and applyed to flesh that cleaueth not to the bone. Concerning barley bread, besides that it lyeth heavy vpon the stomacke, it engendreth also cold and clammy humors: it nourisheth little, causeth windines; and yet some say it is very good for them that haue the gout in their feet.

There is a certen kind of drinke called Beere made of barley, which is commonly vsed instead of wine in all the north countries, to wit in Germany, Bohemia, Polonia, Flanders, & other cold countries of Europe. And if one take too much thereof, it will inebriate or make drunken as well as wine, and that for a longer time, because that beere is most grosse and materiall, and of harder digestion then wine: whereto it is so like also in force and vertue, that Aquavita is likewise made therof. Next after barley, oates are a graine very commodious. In leafe and stalke this graine resembleth wheate, but it beareth on the top therof as it were little two legd grasshoppers, hanging where the graine is enclosed: which though it seeme to be created of nature rather fit for beasts foode, then for man: yet in Germany they oftentimes eat it in good fat flesh pottage, being boyled therein after it hath bin cleansed of all filth, as is vsed in rice. Oates also in the vse of phisick do very neere approach to the quality of Barley: For being applyed, it drieth, and moderately resolueth. But it is a little more cold, and somewhat more restraining in temper, so that it is good for the flux in the belly, and profitable for those that haue the cough.

Of oates.

Of Rice.

We may likewise consider of Rice, which the Ancients did hold to be a kind of corne. The leafe thereof is very thicke, resembling that of a lecke. The stalke thereof is about a cubit long, knotty, bigger then that of wheate, and stronger: on the toppe of it groweth an eare parted into little branches, on both sides whereof is the graine included, in a yealow huske, rough, and hauing creuises on the side, of an ouall figure, and being taken out of the huske it becommeth white. It groweth in some places in Italy in moist ground: but it aboundeth in Asia, Syria, and Egypt. Rice is very vsuall in meat, and nourisheth meanely, but it is made of more easie digestion, and of better tast being sod in cowes milke, almond milke, or fat flesh pottage. It is very good to giue to such as haue the laxe, and colick. The flower thereof is good in repercussive plaisters. It staieth inflammations that rise in the dogs. The decoction of Rice also is very profitable in clisters, against laxes or fluxes; and in drinke likewise. Now to end this talke, we will say something concerning Millet, for it hath many proprieties both in food and phisick. This plant beares leaues like those of a reed hauing a stalke of a cubite long, thicke, knottie, and rough. At the top thereof doe hang certaine hairy heads, in which the graine groweth in great abundance, being round, masculine, yealow, and lapped in a thin skinne. In many places bread is made of this graine, and even at Verona it is caried hote about the streets, whereof they make much account; for it hath a sweetnesse very pleasant to the taste, if it be eaten a little after it is drawn out of the oven: but being hard, it is vnpleasant. The common people of Trent, are nourished with Millet boyled onely, eating it with milke, and it is the best food that they can get. Besides there are very good fomentations, or searge clothes made of Millet, to drie moderately, and to driue out ventosities, especially being mixed with salt. It is happily applied against griping in the belly caused through windinesse: but it is much better yet being mingled with flowers of Cammomill. It is commonly fried in a pan, and then put hote into a bagge, and so laide vpon the diseased parts. It hath the vertue to preserue medicines long time from moulding and putrifying, if they bee buried in an heape of Millet: yea and fresh flesh is long kept thereby in hote weather. Now to finish this dayes discourse, it seemeth good to mee (ACHITOB) that you speake of the Vine and fruit thereof, of which men make their most delicious drinke.

Of Milke.

meec (ACHITOB) that you speake of the Vine and fruit thereof, of which men make their most delicious drinke.

Of the Vine: of Grapes, of Wine, and of Aqua-vita.

Chapter 80.

ACHITO. IT were a very superfluous to make here a long discourse concerning the Vine, and concerning the diuers qualities which are founde in this plant, of which we doe not onely receiue Grapes, a most pleasant, and delicious meate) but haue also that most exquisite drinke which wee call wine: for all the world hath so much cherished the vine, that there are few people of any condition soeuer, but can discourse sufficiently well of it, and of the nature thereof. Wee will briefly then declare that which wee shall thinke most notable therein, and chiefly in the vse of medicine. The leaues, and tender branches thereof helpe the head ach, being laid thereupon, and appease inflammations and heat of the stomacke. The iuice of them drunke serue a gainst Dysenterias, or fluxes, spitting of blood, weaknes of stomack, and the corrupt appetite of great bellied women. The licour of vines, which lieth thick vpon the stock thereof like gum, being taken in drinke with wine, purgeth grauell. The ashes of the branches & stones being mixed with vinegar, helpeth the hard bindings of the fundament, and is good against the stingings and bitings of vipers, and against inflammation of the spleene, beeing laid thereupon with oile of Roses, Rue and vinegar.

the Vine.

As grapes are the most singular fruits of Autumne, so also are they the most nourishing of all the fruites of summer, which are not to be kept, and they engender the best nourishment, especially when they be perfect ripe. But all Raisins doe not nourish after one manner: for sweet ones haue a more hot substance, and therefore they cause thirst, do swell the stomacke, and loosen the belly. Contrariwise, tart ones do bind, do nourish little, & are of hard digestion. Greene and sower ones are naught for the stomacke. And the bigger grapes are, the better they are, especially if they be gathered very ripe. They which are kept hanged vp are best for nourishment, because their great moisture is dried. The fresh and very ripe grape is good for burnings, if the wine thereof bee prest out betwixt ones hands vpon the hurt places. The mother of the wine or grapes being kept and mixed with salt, is profitable against inflammations of the dugs & hardnes of them through too much abundance of milk. The decoction thereof clisterized, serueth greatly for dysenterias or fluxes. The stones or seeds haue a restringent vertue, & are profitable for the stomacke. Being parched and beaten into powder, it is good to eate with meate against the fluxe, and weaknes of stomacke. Dry grapes or raisins haue yet greater vertues and properties in the vse of Physicke, and especially they which are sweetest, and of most substance, as they of Damascus, of Cypres, and of Candia. The meate of them being eaten is good for the cough, for the throate, the reines and the bladder: being eaten with their stones, they serue against Dysenterias. Being boiled in a platter with Sugar and flower of Millet, of Barley, and an egge, they purge the braine: being reduced into a plaister, with flower of Beanes and Cumin, they appease inflammations. Besides, the nourishment of Raisins is so distributed through the body according as their nature is, sweet to the sweet, sower the sower, meane to them that participate with both qualities, and the sweete, full and fat raisins doe nourish more then the sharpe and leane. They which are without stones, either by nature or arte, if they be sweet, they are so deprived of all astringtion, so that they bee maruellously lenitive. And therefore are they most fit for paines of the breast, for the cough, for sore throates, for maladies in the reines and bladder, and are good for the liuer.

Of Grapes.

Property of dry raisins.

But wee may not heere forget to make mention of the fruit of the wilde Vine commonly called in French (Lambrusque) because of the admirable properties thereof. The grapes of it are gathered and put to dry in the shade: they are of a restringent vertue, good for the stomacke, and prouoke vrine: they binde the belly, and stay spitting of blood.

Now must wee speake of Wine which is made of the Raisin, and grape produced

Of wine, and the properties
by thereof.

by the vine. Concerning it many affirme that it is the most sweet licour of all others, the principall aide, and chiefe proppe of humane life, the chiefe restorer of the vitall spirits, the most excellent strengthener of all the faculties and actions of the body, reioicing and comforting the heart very much: and for these causes they say that the Ancients haue called that plant which beareth the fruit, out of which we receiue this wine (Vitis quasi Vita) life. But yet wee must not deceiue our selues by so many praises attributed to wine, considering that the vse thereof by the least excessse that may be, doth bring so many euils vpon man, that they cannot be numbred, nor sufficiently bewailed. But being vsed temperately, we must confesse, that it is a thing of greatest efficacy in the world, to nourish and strengthen the body. For it engendreth very pure blood, it is very quickly conuerted into nourishment, it helpeth to make digestion in all parts of the body, it giueth courage, purgeth the braine, refresheth the vnderstanding, reioiceth the heart, quickeneth the spirits, prouoketh vrine, driueth out ventosities, augmenteth naturall heate, fetheneth them who are in good health, exciteth the appetite, purifieth the troubled blood, openeth stoppings, conuaiteth the nouriture throughout the whole body, maketh good colour, and purgeth out of the body all that which is therein superfluous. But if wine bee taken without great mediocrity and temperance, it doth by accident refrigerate the whole body. For the naturall heate thereof by too much drinke remaineth choaked, even as a little fire is quenched by a heape of wood cast thereupon. Besides wine is hurtfull for the braine, for the marrow of the backebone, and the sinewes grow out of it. Whereby it falleth out, that this principall part beeing hurt, there succede in time, great and dangerous maladies thereupon, to witte, the apoplexie, the falling euill, the palsie, shakings, numbnesse of members, conuulsions, giddines of the head, shrinking of ioynts, the incubus, the catalepsia, lethargie, frensie, rheuems, deafenesse blindnesse, and shrinking of mouth and lippes. Moreouer wine immoderately drunke corrupteth all good manners, and discipline of life. For this is that makes men quarrellers, wranglers, rash, incensed, furious, dice-players, adulterers, homicides, in a word addicted to all vice, and dissolution. Besides, it is to be noted, that wine is fitter for old people then for them of other ages: for it moderateth and maintaineth the colde temperature of auncient folkes, which haue come vpon them for many yeeres. But it should not bee sufferable (if wee follow the counsell of the elders) for children and young folkes to drinke thereof, till they attaine to the age of twenty yeeres. For otherwise it is as much as to put fire to fire. And yet if wee would follow the counsell of the Sages, it should not bee drunke at all, except in certaine indispositions which might happen to the body, according as the vse was in times past in Greece, namely, at Athens, where wine was onely solde in Apothecaries shops, as Aqua vitæ now is. But aboue all, heede must bee taken that in the great heate of the yeare, wine bee not drunke that is cooled by snow, yce, or very cold water, as wee see by great curisitie done among vs. For it greatly hurteth the braine, the sinewes, the breast, the lungs, the stomacke, the bowels, the spleene, liuer, raines, bladder, and teeth. And therefore it is no maruell, if they which ordinarily vse it, are in time tormented with the colicke and paine of the Stomacke: also with conuulsions, palsies, apoplexies, difficulty in breathing, restraintment of vrine, stoppings of the inward members, the drop sic, and many other great and dangerous diseases.

Of the vse of Wine.

Of Aquavitz and the manner how to distill it.

It resteth for conclusion of this discourse, that wee say somewhat concerning wine distilled through a Limbecke in a bathe of water, which the Sages haue called for the admirable vertues thereof (Water of Life.) For to make which: Take of the best wine a certaine quantity according to the vessell wherein you will distill it, and that fill to the third part of the pot or body: then cover it with the head thereof very well closed, so that no vapour may issue out, set it vpon the furnace over a moderate fire, in such sort that the wine boile not. And to haue very good Aqua vitæ, you must distill it foure or five times and more: for the more it is rectified, the perfecter it will bee. And in the first distillation it is sufficient to receiue the tenth part of the wine put into the Limbecke: for the second the halfe; for the third another moitie or lesse: so that the oftner you distill the lesser you haue, but better alwaies. Now you may know whether Aqua vitæ haue attained to full perfection, by these signes: [If it arise to the like quantitie of water, or very neere, as the liquor put in: if being lighted or set on fire it burne all away, & leaue not any marke of moisture in the bottome of the vessel: if a cloth being dipt therin, & lighted, wil not burne at al: if

if a droppe of oyle being cast therein sinke to the bottome, and if a drop of this water spilt in the palme of your hand, doe presently consume and evaporate.] Now the vertues and properties of this Aqua-vitæ, are very many. For as it preserveth from all corruption those things which have bene steeped therein, so all corruption being done away, it keepeth repaireth, maintaineth, augmenteth, and prolongeth the life of those that receive it. And it doth not onely preserve the naturall heate, and maintaine it in vgor, but it also regenerateth the vitall spirit; quickeneth and warmeth the stomacke, sharpeneth the braine and vnderstanding, cleareth the sight, repaireth the memory, especially if they vse it, who are of a cold temper, being subiect to rawnes of stomacke, windmes, and other cold maladies. Thus then haue we declared enough concerning the plants and froits which the earth produceth for the commoditie of man. Wherefore, we will to morrow consider of the diuersity of terrestriall creatures created to the same end, that we may be the more induced to glorifie him, from whom we receive all these benefits.

The end of the tenth daies worke.

The eleuenth daies worke.

Of terrestriall beastes, and especially of Serpents: namely of the Aspis or Adder, and of the Viper.

Chapter 81.

ASER.

Being this day to discourse concerning living creatures of the Earth, so much as the subiect of our speech doth require for the accomplishment of our worke. It behooueth vs to consider that the terrestriall beastes, being as it were innumerable in the species, yet they consist of two principal kinds: to witte, of Insect, and of perfect beastes. They of the first kinde are called of the Latines by this word (Insecta) because of the incisions which appeare vpon their bodies, retayning life in that part, which we behold diuided, and cut off, and they are engendred for the most part of putrefaction: but these things agree not with perfect creatures, who take their forme in the matrice. Now wee will heare summarily entreate of Insect animals generally, and consequently of the most excellent of their kinde, whereof some creepe vpon the earth, as serpents, and others flye, as flies. We are first then to note that all insect beastes are wild, and are very hardly tamed and made milde, for they haue their inner senses very weak; where, as such creature as are made tame and familiar, must haue the facultie of imagination and good memory. Moreouer, these kindes of beastes haue little blood, or none at all, as Philosophers hold, who finde in them a certaine vitall humour only, which nature hath given them instead of blood: for wiche cause they are naturally fearefull; and feare hindreth creatures from being tamed. Likewise they haue commonly but short life: and beastes, who should be made familiar, require time for that purpose. Furthermore, in this kinde of Insect beastes some are engendred onely of putrefaction, as flies: others of eggs, as Serpents: and also by an other manner, which is perfected in the matrice by eggs, as the viper. Now in all this kinde of beastes, they are most admirable, which we haue here named, to wit: serpents because of their greatnesse and puissant effects, and hony-flies or Bees, and silke wormes also, because of their worke.

beasts.*

But amongst the many kindes of Serpents, the Aspis or Adder is very worthy of consideration, and much to be feared: for there are three sorts, each whereof causeth him that is bitten by them soone to die, except he be quickly and very well succoured. One sort is named (Ptyas) another (Chersea) both earth serpents: and the third is called (Chelidonia)

which abideth about banks and rivers, and especially of Nilus. The Ptyas and Chersa are of ashie and green color, drawing a little to the colour of gold. But the Chelidonia hath a blacke backe, and white belly like to swallowes. And both the one and the other sort are of five cubits long in the regions of Africa. They raise vp their necke when they will cast their venime; wherewith when one is attayned their present remedy is speedily to cutte away all that which is bitten, or else it is hard to saue them from death: and yet many speake of diuers remedies; and amongst others they commend very strong vineger, aduising that it should be giuen to the patient to drinke, even so much and for so long time till hee feeles the right side of his flanks: for they say that the liver is first deprived off feeling in such an accident. Some vse Opopanax (a drugge extracted out of Panaces Heracleum) which is giuen to drinke in wine mixed with water, to cause them vomit the venim already spread throughout the whole body. And after such vomiting they must take very good treacle in drinke, and apply it also vpon the biting. Mattheolus describeth a quintessence, composed of Aqua vitæ, and some simples, and aromaticall drugges, which is an excellent remedy of great efficacy, when such accidents happen. For indeede it is most certaine that waters artificially composed, and ingeniously distilled, consisting of most subtile parts, are in a moment disperfed throughout all the veines and arteries, and euery part of the whole body. And therefore they cause, that the blood and spirits waxe not cold, and doe not cougeale in those vessels which containe them, whereby also the naturall heate comming to augment it selfe, doth strongly resist the force of the venim, and doth presently surmount it.

The Viper also is a kinde of serpent, it hath a flat head, and broad neere to the ioint of the necke, which is naturally small, it hath a quickeie, and a naile in the nothrill thereof hauing all the rest of the body short, with the taile also, and is of a pale colour. Her pace and motion is very quicke, and shee beareth her head aloft, shee differeth from other serpents, in that they lay but egges, and she bringeth forth her young ones alieue, which before they come forth doe so gnaw and eate her belly, that she liueth not long after. And although the viper be very venemous, yet is her flesh very good for the composition of treacle, yea though her venim remaine with her after death. Moreover, the biting of the viper is as much, or more dangerous then that of the Aspis: for they who are hurt die within seuen howers after, except they bee well succoured, and at farthest within three dayes, except they be holpen by excellent remedies; of which, amongst others, this is good: cleaue a chicken in two, and lay the inside of her hotte vpon the wound, and doe oftentimes reiterate this order, scarifying the flesh round about the biting, and applying diuers times cupping glasses thereto. After which, you must giue the patient of the iuice of ash tree leaues to drink, and lay the same leaues vpon the wound, or else cammomil brayed, or a plaister made of barley meale, and honied vineger. Some vse briar taken in drink with wine, or the iuice of balme, leaues drunke also with wine. Some say also that the viper being flayed, her taylor and head cut off, and her intrailles drawn out and cast away, afterwards sod like an Eele, and eaten by him that hath been bitten, doeth greatly aide him to obtaine health. As Treacle also beeing chiefly made of vipers flesh, eaten, and applied to, is a singular remedie in such accidents.

I could heere discourse of many other kinds of Serpents: but it is not our intent to represent a perfect history of liuing things, considering that many authors haue written thereof for our learning. Wherefore we will content our selues onely to adde to that which we haue said concerning Serpents, how that Plinie hath noted, that in the Indies there are so great, and such prodigious ones, that they will swallow an Hart, or a Bull all whole, and that in the dayes of Attilius Regulus Generall of the Romanes, in time of the warres against the Carthaginians, there was seene a Serpent in Africa of an hundred and twentie foote long, neere to the flood of Bagrada, which was assailed with engines of warre, and all maner of weapons, in such sort as if they had determined to giue assault to some strong citie: that in the reigne also of the Emperor Claudius, there was a serpent killed, named (Boa) which was found in mount Vatican, that had a childe found whole in her belly. This author doeth make mention of a certaine towne in Italy called Amycla, which had beene abandoned and left desolate of the inhabitants, by reason of Serpents that chased them away. But this is most admirable which hee reporteth, that Spiders seeing a Serpent layde along vnder a tree where they haue weaved their cobwebbes, will runne directly downe by a threed vpon the head of the Serpent, and will pierce him so to the quicke of the braine, that that they will constrain the serpent to bite and gnash his teeth, to tumble and torment himselfe, without ever being able to get away, or breake the spiders threed in such sort that he shall still remaine there. Hee saith also that a Locust will kill a serpent, in wringing him hard by the throat, and will not loosen till such time as he be through dead. But who will not greatly wonder at that which the same author testifieth to have seene by experience that a serpent enclosed and enuironed with ashe leaves on the one side, and fire on the other, hee should rather choose to cast himselfe into the fire, then to save himselfe through the ashe leaves? So much is this tree contrary to serpents, that even lie the shadow thereof both at morning and even; and indeede to drinke the iuice of the leaves thereof, and to lay the same leaves vpon the wound, is soueraigne remedie against all their bitings. Whereupon Plinie taketh occasion to note, how that nature doth herein shew herselfe a very benigne and provident mother towards men, in that the ash should alwaies budde before serpents should creepe out of the earth, and that these trees should still bee greene, till such time as serpents should haue withdrawne themselves. Now let vs speake of the other kindes of Insects chosen by vs, as the most excellent, to wit (Bees and silke-wormes) concerning which (A M A N A.) let vs heare you discourse.

Chapter 82.

A M A N A. MAny graue authors haue not disdained, diligently to search out, and curiously to describe the history of Bees, being chiefly moued thereunto through the admiration of their cunning in compoling two so excellent commodities as are hony and waxe: we will here then deliuer that which we esteeme to be most worthy of note in their writings. First Bees are rusticke and wilde; or tame and familiar. And the wilde are more il fauoured to behold, more fierce and naught. Of the tame there are two kindes. One kinde are round and short, and of diuers colours, and these are the best. The other are long and liketo waspes, and the worst of these are rough and hairie. All of them hate stincks and infections, and flie from them, for which cause they neuer sting such as are perfumed with sweete odors. They neuer flie against the light, nor vpon any flesh, nor to bloud, nor to any fat thing, but doe onely seeke out leaues and flowers, which haue an odoriferous iuice. They delight in harmonious sounds and noises, whether by it commeth, that being scattered, they are assembled together, by the sound of a bason, or of some little bells, or by clapping the hands gently together. They vse great policie amongst themselves, and there it no swarme but hath a king and captaine, which is bigger then all the other Bees, and hath short wings, straight legs, a brauer march then all the rest with spot in his fore head, serueth as a Diademe or crowne, and is in euery part more slicke, smooth, and faire then all the rest. When hee goeth any whither, the whole troupe followeth, encompassing and garding him, not permitting that hee bee easily seene. And whilst all are at worke, the king goeth from place to place cheering them, and hee himselfe doth nothing else. Hee neuer commeth forth except when the whole troupe goeth into the fieldes: which may bee knowne certaine daies before by the noise which the Bees make within their hines, attending for some faire day to part in. If the king loose a wing, the troupe doth not forsake him: for alwayes every one of them desireth to be neere him, and to do him seruice. And if he be weary they helpe him on their shoulders: if tyred, they carrie him: and in what place soeuer he resteth, all the swarme encampeth: If perhaps they loose him, they establish a new king of the race of the former, hauing diuerse selected and knowne among them to succede those that faile. For the rest of their gouernement, their witte is no lesse admirable then their worke, as is recorded to haue beene obserued by Aristomachus Solensis, who delighted himselfe for 58. yeere together to nourish diligently these little animals, so much he loued them, neuer applying himselfe to any other thing. By which kinde of meanes it was knowne that in the day time the Bees ward, and watch at the gate as in a campe, and rest in the night till such time as one amongst them being as Sentinall, wakeneth them with two or three sounds as it were of a trumpet. Then all of them assemble to see if it be faire weather: for they can iudge of the windes, and of the raine, and in foule weather they bouge not: but if the weather be faire and calme, all goe

to work. Some bring in their feet, that which they haue drawn out of flowers: others, beare water in their mouth: and some againe helping them with a small haire do lade themselues with a drop of water over all their body. The yonger sort go forth to doe these thinges, and the older trauell within the hives, where their offices are appointed them. For some builde, others polish; this brings in matter, that victuals; another water, and all of them haue all things common, and obserue equalitie in meate and worke. They watch who are idle, and chastise and punish them even sometimes by death. First they make their combs and waxe, whereof they build their lodgings. After they bee lodged, they consider how to multiply themselves, and last of all they make their hony. And they haue this wittie industrie, to mixe in the matter, wherewith they first besmeate or overcast their hives, the iuice of the most bitter herbes they can finde, to the end to put such small beastes or flies out of tast that would sucke thereof; euen as if they had bene informed, that their worke was sought after. In briebe all their manner of life, order and policie is euery way admirable.

Of Hony.

But what may we say particularly concerning their hony and waxe, the vse whereof is so commodious and profitable to man? It is certaine that these industrious creatures know how to choose and gather a kinde of dew, which falleth from heaven (at the rising of certaine stars, especially in the dog daies) vpon the leaues of plants, whereof they make hony. And the best is that which is of a deepe yellow colour, and hath a pleasant smell, beeing pure and neat, shining euery where, and sweete in tast, being also of a meane substance betweene liquid, and thicke. In vertue it hath the propertie to hinder corruption, and rottenness: and therefore some make gargarismes thereof to cleanse and mundifie the vlcers of the mouth. It preserveth life especially in those that are of cold complexion: so wee behold that the Bee, which is a feeble, and tender creature liueth nine or ten yeeres, because shee is nourished by hony. It is a steriue, opening, and attracteth humours. Beeing in time applied to any part of the body which is bruised by some blow, or fall, it is a singular remedy to heale any such bruise, if so be the skinn be not broken. And the waxe (which is made of the combs taken out of hives, after that they haue bene well pressed, and that all the hony hath been drained out) is likewise of singular vtility for men. The best should be very yealow, sweete, fatte, light, pure, close, euen, neat, and cleansed from all filth. It is of meane qualitie betwixt hot, cold, moist, and dry things, and is of a grosse and clammy substance: retaining an hot and resolute vertue, which also aboundeth in hony. It is ministred in drinke against Dysenterias: but aboue all it is profitable in the composition of ointments, which are made for wounds.

Of Waxe.

Of Silke-wormes.

Now let vs speake of Silke wormes, which next to Bees merit most admiration amongst all insect beastes. This worme is first bredde of another worme of the same kinde which hath hornes, for thereof commeth a snail, which afterwards produceth the silke worme called Bombyx, and by some Nedyalus, which is like to a butterflie; and layeth eggs through the copulation of the male and female; out of which egges in the end those wormes creepe who by so maruailous industrie do make vs our silke, that in a short time is drawne out of their mouth by a small threed, which afterward is weaved with such wondrous art, that therein is nothing broken, false, or vneuen, but euery whit perfect from the beginning to the end of euery bottome or clewe, beeing one fastened to another. And that which maketh their labour seeme more wondrous, is; that these creatures are without flesh, blood, or bones; without vaines, sinewes or arteries; without scales, or any intrails: as also outwardly they are seene to be without teeth, nailes, prickles, or bristles, haire, eies, or eares: and yet in lesse then fortie daies, how small soeuer they be when they are engendred, they become thicke and great; hauing the benefit of eating, & sleep, and they cast their skin foure times. And then their bodies beginneth to glister, oftentimes shewing the sheene of silke which is in their belly, which if they must make white, they haue their head as white as silver: if the silk must be yealow, their head will be like gold: if Greene, or tawny, their head will beare the signe thereof. Then do they seek where to fasten it, and so weaue their silke in order, till such time as they haue performed their work, which doth not only serue for clothing for men, but for a singular remedy also to comfort a sicke heart, to reioice it, to recreate sadde, and melancholy spirits, as we may acknowledge by that excellent confection called of Phisitons (Alkermes) which for the most part compounded of the decoction and infusion of silke in the iuice of kermes, being drunke is a soueraigne medicine against faintnesse and syncope. But hauing already said enough concerning Insect beastes, for the

the subject of our discourse, we will consequently speake of some perfect beasts, according as wee shall make choise of, as of the most worthiest to enrich our present worke, to the ende, as we haue decreed that the creator may be glorified: wherof (A R A M) you must now entreate.

Of the Dog, and of the Horse. Chapter 83.

A R A M. Amongst perfect beasts, the Dog and Horse do by good right deserve the first and chiefe degree, as well because of their admirable sense, as also because of the utility, pleasure, and commodity, which they bring to man. Concerning these creatures, then shall our present discourse intreat: and first of the dog; which (as many authors asfirme) tooke his originall from the wolfe, being tamed by the industrie of man. Now there are many sorts of dogs, all which we may comprehend vnder two kindes: the one is, of them which are to keepe house, and the other to chase withall. The house dogge ought to bee of grosse and bigge bodie, being square set, and rather short then long: his heade of the house great, his throat wide, thicke lips, bigge hanging eares, his eyes blew and blacke, hur- dogge.
 ning and sparkling, his necke thicke and short, his brest large and rough, his shoulders broad, legs thicke and hairy, and a short and thicke taile, which is a signe of force, (for the long and small taile noteth swiftnes) his paw and nailes great, his barking high, bigge and fearefull: about all vigilant and very watchfull, not running heere and there, but stayed, and more slow then hastie. Hunting hounds are of sundry sorts. They which are swift are either white or browne, or gray, or blacke. And the white are best, for they are well the chase.
 winded, quicke, fierce, and will not leane the chase for any heat whatsoever, neither will breake off for the prease of hunters, nor for the noise and cry of men, and they obserue change better then any other kinde of hound, and are more certaine: but they feare the water somewhat, especially in winter time. If they bee cleane white, or spotted with redde, they are the better. The browne doth second them, and are of a great courage, forward, quicke and fierce, fearing neither water nor cold, but they cannot endure heate, and are not so easie to gouerne as the white. The gray are not so quicke and furious as the rest, neither yet the blacke, who are commonly the biggest bodied. Yet there are good dogs of all haire and colours, but to choose a faire and good hound indeede, these signes must bee obserued. His head must bee meanelly thicke, more long then flat, his nostrils wide and open, eares broad, and reasonable thicke, crooked reines; thicke loines; bigge and large hanches; faire thighes; the right hamme-joynt well knit; the taile thicke, neere to the raines, and the rest small to the end: the haire vnder his bellie rough, a thicke legge, and the paw of his foote drie, and like to the pawe of a foxe; great nailes, as high behinde as before and the dogge must bee short and crooked, but the bitch must bee long. For open nostrils declare the dogge to bee well winded: and crooked reines and straight hams signifie quickenesse, the taile thicke neere to the raines, long and small to the end, denote strenght and force in the raines, and that the hound is well breathed, haire rough vnder the belly declarerth that he is painefull, fearing neither water nor colde, a thicke legge, foxes foote, and great nailes, demonstrate that hee is not heauie footed and that he is strong in members to runne long without tiring. Besides houndes, there be gray hounds, blood hounds, water spaniels, tumblers and mungrels, all which are of diuers kindes, but our meaning is not to set downe an entire narration thereof, considering that it is not necessary for that purpose, which we haue decreede in our discourses. Wherefore wee will content our selues to note in generall, that there is no beast of greater sense and loue, nor more docible then the dog. For there bee few things fit for the pleasure of man, but may be easily taught to this kinde of creatures, especially in all points concerning hunting. Also histories abound with testimonies of their knowledge, and loue towards those that nourish them. Plinie reporteth of a dogge, which defended his master being assailed by theeues, till such time they had slaine him: and that after his death the dog would not leaue his body, but kept it both from the birds, and from other wild beasts that would haue deuoured it. That another dog also knowing one amongst a troupe of people that had slaine his master, flew vpon him.

and bit him with such furie, that the murtherer was constrained to confesse the cause of the dogs rage, reuealing his owne mildeed.

Of the horse. Now speake we of the horse, which of all beasts is most profitable for man, and is full of meekenes and docilitie. He is praised in seuen and twentie conditions: of which he seemeth to take three of the woman: to wit, yoong age, meeknes of manners and beawtie: three of the lion, courage, force, and to be tall before, not bowing in the midst, nor higher before then behinde: three of the Eagle, a good eie, a little head, and to beare his head straigh and a loft, three of the ox, the foote great, thighes moderately thicke, and short & strong ioints: three of the hart, quickenes, deliueres to run and leape well, and lightnes: three, of the asse, strong hooves, an hard skinne, and a strong able backe, three of the foxe, a faire taile, agilitie, and a faire skinne, three of the goose, to eat well and quicke, and to digest it, to haue full bowels, and in his pace his feete equally distant, without enterfering, and three which are proper to himselfe, a quicke and calie pace, liuelinesse, promptnesse, and gallantnesse of heart; and readinesse to obey the bridle and spur without being slow therein. If then we will know when an horse is perfectly faire, wee must first note that hee haue a small head, a gallant and faire forehead, drie and cleane flesh, great and blacke eies and standing out; short, sharpe and straight eares, little, drie and thinnelips, and not vneuen, a wide throat, big, open, and red nostrills, his necke neither too short nor too long, but meane, loftie, not too fat and crooked like an arch and vault, with a fine curled and long mane, also that he haue a large breast, soft, and bearing out like that of a dove, big boned legs, but leane, & drie of flesh, straight, high, and even from the foote to the knee, thicke, long, fat, sinewie, and fleshiethighes, but yet answerable to his buttockes, sides, and flankes, high heeles, thicke and short ioynts, and not close to the hoofe which must bee hard, high, round, blacke and hollow, hee must also haue the backe short, not bunched, nor high like an asses backe, but even, not too high nor too low, broad, long, great, straight and well flesht shoulders, a smooth, strong, massiue, thicke, and as it were a double crupper, a short taile of bone, small, strong, long haired, which hee must beare close betwixt his thighes, a large and round flanke, full sides, and long about the belly, which must be round, small, and well set vnder the sides, that must bee broad and long with a little distance from the hinder part to the ioynt of the haunch, and with small and equall coddles. Moreouer, hee must haue to bee good, a stately pace, a deliuer trot, a swift gallop, a light course, a bounding and sudden leape, an assured and ready pace, quicke at hand, & prompt to turne every way, to recule backe, and to runne suddainely forward, not stamping or rattling with his bit, nor kicking against the spur, but conforming himselfe to the will of his master, without starting, or being afraid of any thing that hee seeth, heareth, or feeleth, not flinging and kicking amongst other horses. In a word that horse is to bee esteemed which hath a lively and couragious heart, which is obedient, gentle, deliuer, quicke, and well mouthed, having a good foot, and strong reines. For haire, the bay is best of all others which being of diuers colours, doe depend neuertheless vpon these fower, bay, russet, blacke, and gray. For these fower colours proceed of fower principall humours whereof the body of an horse is composed, and which agree and accord with the fire, aire, earth, and water. For choler which resembleth the fire engendreth the bay, blood which accordeth with the aire, produceth the russet or reddish coloured. Fleame which is answerable to the water, causeth the gray, and melancholy which agreeth with the earth, begetteth the blacke. The bay haire then excelleth all others, as being that which beareth the signe and marke of a couragious horse, hardy in warre, and most singular in iusts and combats, in so much as hee feareth nothing, nor looseth courage howsoeuer he feele himselfe wounded, because also he seeth not, by reason of his colour, the blood runne streaming out of his body. The russet haire betokeneth a quicke, hardy, and prompt horse, but not of great force, and the blacke is Melancholy, and vnsonnd, and the gray is heauie, and fearefull. Moreover, by howe much more these colours are diuersified, and mixed with markes, and spots, by so much is the goodnesse or badnesse of the horse greater. Wee may also say truly, that amongst all the beasts which God hath created for the seruice of man; there is not one which may compare with the Horse, either in beawtie, labour, vnderstanding, or profit, and commoditie. For the Horse onely, serueth for an honourable grace for man: who makes him to goe at his pleasure, sometimes softly, sometimes apace now a trot, anon a gallop, another time with swift posting speed, and sometimes he plaieth with him, causing him to make many risings, and diuers curuets, bounds and leapes: and other other time he maketh him runne wheeling about in a round ring, then to bound, and rebound, and lastly to goe easily forwardes. And by meanes of this vse and exercise, a man chaseth away melancholy humors, fortifieth his stomacke and whole body, and augmenteth his disposition and grace, and abilitie: Moreover there is no iourney so difficult, which hee will not vnder take with a good horse, knowing that hee can passe any whither and saue himselfe from the assaults of theeues, and robbers; yea and oftentimes the horse fighteth with feete and teeth for the safety of his master. But these generous beasts doe especially declare their valor and courage in the cruell encounters of battailes, and fights, being incited by the fearefull noise of gunshot, by the hideous thundering of cannons, by the sounding of trumpets, and rumbling of drums: then I say when all being in confusion, it seemeth that the earth opens, that the place flies in peeces, and that hell swallowes vp all, in respect of the shiuering of launces, clinking of armor, and the deadfull cries of men, who are there, by thousands, hewen in peeces. And many doe scape by the onely meanes of their horses, God shewing them such fauour as histories are full of testimonies thereof, and of the admirable sense, wherewith nature hath endued these beasts. Amongst which Alexanders horse Bucephalus is very much celebrated, chiefly because that hee would not suffer any to ride him but his maister, although he had beene cloathed in kingly robes. It is also said, that this horse beeing wounded at an assault of Thebes, he would not permit Alexander to mount vpon another, till such time as hee had brought him out of all danger. Plinie reporteth, that a certaine king of Seythia being ouerthrowne in battell, when his enemy came to disarme him, his horse ranne vpon him with such fury, that he killed him, reuenging so the death of his maister: And that after the death of king Nicodemus (who was slaine) his horse would neuer eate, but died through hunger and sorrow. And that one named Antiochus seazing vpon an horse of one Galatus slaine in fight, mounted thereupon, reioicing at the death of the other: which the horse of the dead man vnderstanding, did in rage and despise so sling, and runne, that he bare Antiochus ouer mountaines, and rocks, casting himselfe at last downe from an high place, so breaking his owne and his riders necke. But wee haue said enough hereof. Now (ACHITOR) let vs heare you continue the discourse concerning beasts.

Hist. nat. lib. 8.
cap. 42.

Of the Elephant, of the Camell, and of the Rhinoceros.
Chapter 84.

ACHITOR. IT seemeth that there is no beast, which approacheth neerer to the sense of man then the Elephant. For hee is endued with so excellent witte, discretion, and memory, that hee surpasseth in these gifts of other beastes; as becometh in strength also. Hee is bigger then two great oxen, couered with blacke haire, hauing eyes like to those of swine & such a mouth also, being couered with a truncke, or snout that hangs downe to the ground, which serueth him for an hand to put his victuals into his mouth, both meate and drinke: and out of both sides thereof two great tuskes doe issue, which are fastened in his vpper iaw. His eares are two spannes broad, his thighes and legs thicke and long, in such sort that some are found of fiftene foote high: his nailes (beeing five in number about his feete) are round, and each naile a palme broad, and his tayle is about three handfuls long. In many regions of Africa they vse these Elephants to ride ordinarily vpon, and they serue for many domestick busineses also, so that the traffike of them there, is as that of horses heere. But the Indians vse them in the warre, putting vpon this beast, a certaine saddle beeing girt very streight about him with two yron chaines, vpon which they set two wooden houses, on either side one, and in each of those houses do three men lodge, betweene which houses and the Elephants necke, is a little seate placed, vpon which a man sitteth like as if he were on horsebacke, who guideth this beast by his wordes, which he vnderstandeth very well: and he carieth neither bridle, nor halter, nor any thing else vpon his head. And euen as they, which are within these houses vpon his backe are armed with coates of maile, with bowes, launces, swordes, and targets: so likewise will he be couered with a mayle, especially vpon his head, and snout, to which men fasten a sword of two fathomes in length, thicke, and as broad as a mans hand, wherewith this beast doeth himselfe in fight. In all things else he is of incredible force. For Lewel de Barthema in the discourses of his Indie voyages doeth testifie that he did see three Elephants alone drawn a ship out of the sea, and set it aland, after the people had gotten vnder it three great wedges of wood. For kneeling down vpon the earth on the sea shore, they did with their heads cast the ship on drie land. Plinie recordeth many other wonders concerning these beasts, saying, that they honour the starres, and principally the Sunne and Moone, that some haue beene scene, who being sicke, haue fallen downe backwards, casting vp herbes towards heauen, as if they would offer vp the fruits of the earth in sacrifice, and prayer to obtaine succour from above: that all of them doe honour a king, and fall downe vpon their knees before him, and that they bring chaplets of hearbes, and flowers vnto him. That some of them haue beene scene to record by themselves in the night time, that, which they haue beene taught in the day time, to the ende that they might the better put it in practise. That marching in troupes, the eldest amongst them goeth formost, as capitaine: and another behinde them as ordering the rereward: that intending to passe any riuer, they put the yongest elephants formost, knowing that the great elephants would sinke lower, because of their excessive heauinesse, and would by that meanes make the fould more difficult to passe, by reason of the water, which would gather there. That they doe no harme except they be prouoked thereto; and also that they are so gentle towards other weake beasts, that passing by a flocke of small cattell, they will gently turne backe with their heads all those beasts which they meete, for feare of hurting them, or treading them vnder their feete. They are very long liued, to two hundred or three hundred yeares, as Aristotle affirmeth: and when the male and female couple together as man and woman, they withdraw themselves for this purpose into most secret and hidden places: and the females beare their yong ones for two yeares together, and doe neuer bring forth but one, and that but once onely in their life. Of their teeth is the true iuorie made: but because there are but few to be had, therefore some saw and cut in pieces the bones of Elephants, which they sell for iuorie. Moreouer, Historiographers report that the first time that Elephants were scene at Rome, was in the triumph of Pompey, after he had subdued Africke, for hee had two yoked to his chariot: and that in the turnies, and fence playes which Germanicus Caesar made, to shewe pastime to the people of Rome, there were Elephants that leaped, as if they would skippe and daunce: and that fortie two Elephants were brought in triumph to Rome after the memorable victorie, which Rufcius Metellus did obtaine in Sicily against the Carthagenians.

Of the Camell.

The camell is also a very tractable beast and profitable to man, very ingenious: and apt to receiue discipline. For they serue to ride vpon, to beare great burthens, and also to shew men pastime in many exercises which is taught them by vse. There are some in all parts of the world, but they abound in Africa. And the Arabians hold them for their greatest riches and possessions. There are three kindes of them; one whereof is very great, another sort are very little: these two kindes haue but one bunch vpon their backes, and the other are of meane stature, and haue two bunches, each whereof are fit to carrie burthens, and to rid vpon also, besides, some of them resemble asses in colour, and some are reddish: and they haue their hooves almost clouen in two, but not exactly, so that their foote expresseth a kinde of semblance of five toes fleshie vnderneath, which maketh them tender in stony places. The best Camells are those of Africa, because they beare their charges for the space of fortie daies together, without ever eating any oates, but only such grasse as is in the fields, or some boughes, and their least burthen is of a thousand waight, being by a naturall instinct sovrge to the seruice of man, that with the least touch which may bee vpon their necke or knees, they will presently bend and kneele vpon the ground to receiue their load; which when they feele to bee answerable to their strength, they rise againe vpon their feete. There are some of them so swift, that they will run fifty miles and more in a one day, but these are of small stature, being good for nothing but to ride vpon. The noble men of Arabia, Numidia, and Africans of Lybia do neuer vse other steeds. And when the king of Tumbuto would haue any matter of importance to bee signified to the merchants of Numidia with speed, he sendeth a Poste vpon one of his Camells, who runneth from Tombuto to Darba, or Segelmessa in the space of seuen or eight dayes, which are about foure hundred and fiftie French miles: being a cuntry full of deserts, so that the way is very hard to find out, but by the very direction of the Camell it selfe. When these beasts are lustie, which lasteth for fortie dayes together with them, they waxe verie fierce and outrageous, and will remember the least blow that their masters shall strike them with

with a sticke, so that if they may fasten their teeth vpon any of them, they will lift them vp into the aire, then cast them down again, & murder the with their forefeet, in terrible and grievous manner: but that time being passed, they become gentle and tractable, as before. They neuer drinke but from five daies to five daies, and sometimes they stay nine, or fi- teene dayes, whether it be by custome, or that this beast is dry, or else that Nature hath so well provided that this creature which lieth in deserts, should haue no neede to drinke oftentimes in those places, where water is seldome found. He daunceth at the sound of the trumpet, and seemeth to reioyce at musicke, refreshing himselfe, and taking new courage, then, when (being tyred with a tedious iourney) his guide beginneth to sing some merry song: and some also haue bin seene to dance at the sound of a tabor, as the Author of the de- scription of Africa doth testifie. Lib. 9.

Now speake we of the Rhinoceros (which is named by some the Bull of India) beeing Of the Rhi-admirable amongst other beasts. For he is almost as bigge as the Elephant, his thighe noceros.
is bigger, of the colour of wood, being all naturally armed with shels, which hee beareth like bucklers. He hath in the vppermost part of his forehead an horne for the length of a span or more, very hard, strong, straight, and very sharpe, which turneth towards the forehead, and when he will fight he whetteth it. And there are some also which haue another little horne vpon the skinn of their backe, which is so hard and difficult to penetrate, that no arrow how sharp soeuer it be, can pierce it thorough. And therefore the Indians arme them- selues with their skinn, as wee doe with harneis and murrions, and couer their horses with it, as we doe ours with barbs and armour. This beast hath continuall warre with the Elephant, and is his great enemy, fighting chiefly with him, yea and with all other beasts, when the female bringeth forth her young ones: of which the male is so carefull, that nothing dare come nigh him, but he will wreake his forie thereon. And hee remaineth for the most part victorious ouer the Elephant, if hee can picke him vnder the belly, as beeing the softest place of all his body. For when the Rhinoceros doth strike him there, he giueth him so deepe a wound, that the Elephant can hardly scape death. And he hath this wit na- turally, that when hee will prepare himselfe to fight, hee whetteth his horne against some rocke, which horne the Indians vse in many things, and especially against all poison: so that being bitten or stung by any serpent, or other venomous beast, they their haue recourse to this horne. Whereupon the authour of the vniuersall Cosmographie taketh occasion to suppose, that that which is attributed to the Vnicorne, is the propertie of the Rhinoceros, and that the pieces which are shewed vnder the name of Vnicornes horne, are of the horne of this Indie beast: considering that there are as many such Vnicornes, as Plume, Soliman, and Munster write of, as there be Phenixes or Griffons. But omitting such disputations, let vs consider vpon other excellent beasts, the discourse whereof (A SER) I referre to you. Then. lib. 11.

Of the Lion, of the Tigre, and of the Panther.

Chapter. 85.

A SER. OF all fourefooted beasts, the Lion doeth beare away the chiefe prize. Hee Of the lion.
hath a long bodie of tawnie colour, a fierce looke, his tayle long, which hee oftentimes moueth, his haire before soft, and broad, his skinn impenetrable: his hinder part narrowe, a great head, a wide throate, his necke and teeth so strong, that hee can carrie away a camell, and hee is armed with very great and strong clawes: besides he is so hardie that hee feareth not alone to assaile two hundred men. And then are they in their chiefest strength, when the haire of their necke is so long that it couereth their necke and shoulders. Africa nourisheth many of these beasts, beeing most cruell, especially in the kingdom of Fez, & in all Ethiopia: but they which keepe in the cold mountaines, are not so dangerous, nor so troublesome to men. For in a little towne named (Pietra Rossa) which is very neere to a Forrest that stretcheth out all along the foote of a mountaine of the said countrey, Lions doe oftentimes enter, with so great mildnes, that they gather together, and eat the bones and other things which they finde cast about the streetes: and the women and children are so accustomed thereto, that they are in no wise afraide of them. So many Historiographers doe write, that the Lion onely amongst wilde beasts, will doe no- thing to those that couch and humble themselves before him. And how furious soeuer he be, yet will he rather runne vpon a man then at a woman; and will neuer set vpon children, except he be very much oppressed by hunger. He knoweth when the Lionesse, who by nature is very lasciuious and wanton, doth suffer herselfe to be couered by the Leopard and then doth he runne furiously vpon her to chastise her: which causeth the Lionesse to haue the craft to go wash herselfe in some riuer, to take away the sent of the Leopard: who hath beene with her: or else she will follow the Lyon a farre off, to the end that he may not smell her. This beast drinketh little, and eateth but in one day of twaine: and if he bee well sufficed, he will remaine three daies after without eating. When he findeth himselfe to be assailed with shotte, he declareth his greatnes of courage, in that hee maketh no account thereof, endeavouring to defend himselfe by the onely hideousnes of his countenance: and it seemeth verily that he protesteth to be constrained to annoy those who pursue him, in defence of himselfe: in such sort, that rather through rage then for feare of death, he sets him in his owne guard. And he demonstraterh also another generositie of hart, in that that feeling himselfe ouermatched both by dogs and hunters, if it be in an open field where he may be seene, he will make semblant to despise and scorne the hounds, sometimes making head against them, and will retire by little and little for his honour, alwaies standing vpon his guard: but after that he hath gotten the wood, where he may not be seene to flie, hee runs away as fast as he can, knowing very well that the place couereth his shame. If he feeles himselfe stroken and wounded, he can marke him who gaue him the blowe, and will euer turne vpon him, how great a number soeuer there be of people: and yet for all his fury hee quaketh to heare the rumbling of wagons, and is afraid to see a cocke which setteth vp himselfe and clappeth his wings, and more afraide when hee croweth: but about all hee feareth fire. They say also that Lyons be neuer sicke but through pride: and that they which nourish them, beeing minded to chase them, yea to madde them, doetye apes neere vnto them, whose trickes and gestures they take in scorne, and vexethemselues much thereat. But it is strange that these furious and prooue beasts, are tamed by the industry of man, euen to make them so familiar as to serue them. For histories report that Marcus Antonius during the ciuill warres of the Romanes; cased Lions to be coupled to endure the yoke, and draw his chariot; and that he entred Rome in triumph in such equipage. That Hanno also, capitaine of the Carthaginians did first vndertake to touch Lions with his hand, and that he made them go vp and downe the towne like little dogges: whereupon the people doubting so quicke and pearcing a witte, which could inuent how to tame the fiercest beast of all others, tooke occasion to suppose their common wealth but badly assured in his hands, and so they banished him. Belon also in his obseruations recounteth, that there is an auncient Church at Constantinople, to every pillar whereof there is a Lion tied, which the great Turke causeth to be nourished, and that their gouernors loofethem, handle them, and tie them againe when they list, sometimes leading them through the city.

Of the Tigre

The Tigre approacheth neere to the force of the Lion, and is more to bee feared, because of his crueltie and swiftnesse, which they find true who chase after their young ones. For when they carrie them away running with all speede vpon good horses, the Tigresse returneth to her denne, and finding it emptie, taketh her course as swift as the winde, following them by the tract, which haue robbed her of her young ones: who perceiuing her approach by the noise that shee maketh, vse to cast her downe one, which shee taketh in her mouth, and carrieth to her denne with incredible speed, how heauie soeuer it bee: and afterwards returneth to the pursuite of the rest, alwayes pursuing her fawnes, till such time as shee beholdeth that shee cannot come at those who beare them away, because they haue gained some towne, wherein they are immured. These beastes are very common in Hircania, as also in the Indies; and in Aethiopia: and the inhabitants there doe hunt them much, because it is a very dangerous beast, which would doe much harme if it might multiply: as also because their skinn is very faire, whereof they make very excellent fures, which haue spots of diuers colours, wherewith they clothe themselves. But how soeuer cruell the Tigre is, yet the Hircanians doe nourish and tame them for their pleasure. And Plinie affirmeth, that the Tigresse hath such feare and respect of man, that so soone as shee perceiue him out of her denne, shee presently conueieth her young ones thence: whereupon this author doeth take occasion to admire the power of nature, in that the greatest and cruellst of all beastes doe presently vnderstand wherefore to feare, without euer hauing seene any thing before, which might cause feare. He recounteth also, that the Emperour Augustus was the first first that ever shewed the people of Rome a tame Tygresse in a cage, and that after him Ibid. c. 17.

Claudius Cesar shewed fowre at a time.

The Panther is another common beast in the regions of Africa, very sauage, and whom the inhabitants dread much. Some say that Lucernes and Leopards are one kind of beasts, and they serue for males to the Panther, not differing from them but in whitenesse, which is very great in her, hauing little blacke spots set vpon her body in manner of eies. Also very faire fures are made of her skinne, which are called Lucernes. Moreouer some say that all foure footed beasts doe very much loue the smell of the Panther: but the fiercenes of her countenance doth feare them: and that to entrap other by her odour, shee hides her head that she may catch them. Some also write that she hath a marke vpon her shoulder like to an halfe moone, which augmenteth and decreaseth as the moone doth. This kinde of beasts haue the craft to watch passengers in woods, hiding themselves close in the thickest groues of trees which they can finde; out of which they start vpon them like theeues. And they haue this by nature, to fold in their claws, when they go that they may alwaies keepe them sharp and vnbroken and can open them when they will, and shut them when they graspe any thing. But omitting the fiercenes of this beast, who will not greatly admire the sense and imagination of a certain Panther wherof Plinie writeth? Shee desiring to meet with some passenger, lurked close in the midst of an high way: One by chance comming thither, and finding her, would for feare haue turned this bridle. But the poore beast couched and fell downe before him, making signes to sawne vpon him, and moaned, and tormented himselfe in such sort, as he might easily vnderstand thereby that shee was in great paine, and indeed her young ones were fallen into a pit far off from that place. The man taking hart, at the beasts manners, who drew him gently by the garment, did follow her to the same pit: whether being come, and knowing the occasion of the Panthers grieve, hee drew her young ones out of the place wherinto they were fallen, deliuering by this means their dam of paine, and redeeming also his owne life. For this beast, which could haue bereft him of it, did contrariwise in acknowledgement of the benefit received by him, leaping and skipping with her little ones, keepe the man company out of the Forrest, shewing him by many signes, that shee rendred thanks vnto him. But here change wee talke: and let vs heare you (A M A N A) deliuer that which you haue learned concerning the nature of other beasts.

Of the Panther.

Of the Wolfe, of the Beare, and of the Ape. Chapter 86.

A M A N A. Amongst all sauage beasts, there are none more common then the Woolfe. For Asia, Africa, Europe, and many places of that fourth part of the world, which late Cosmographers and other famous men haue by their long nauigations discovered, do nourish these creatures. And although many haue thought that England had none of them, yet there are some found in sundry places, and especially about Barwicke: And in times past the countrey hath bene much vexed by them. But histories record, that Edgar their king, who liued in the time of Lotharius king of France, a very politick prince, being aduertised of the spoile which these beasts did, made an edict throughout his land, that euery Nobleman should bring vnto him each yeere tenne wolues, or else the skins of them, and that the Prince of Wales, as he who receiued greatest commoditie by hunting of them, should euery yeare bring him an hundred. Whereby it came to passe that in lesse then tenne yeares, there was no mention made of any of those beasts. Now although they bee verie common, yet are they therefore worthie of no lesse consideration, and wonder. Many authors haue written concerning their shape, manners, nature, and differences, as also how to hunt and take them. There be few which are ignorant, that the wolfe is a beast hauing gray haire, mixed with blacke, whitish vnder the belly, a bigge head armed with long and strong teeth, and short and stiffe eares, whereupon the prouerbe arose (I hold the wolfe by the eares) when he which speaketh is in doubt of what hee shall doe. This beast feedes onely vpon flesh, saues sometimes on fish, although Aristotle and Plinie write, that being oppressed with hunger hee eateth earth. But indeede this opinion did first spring, because that these beasts are oftentimes seene to digge vp the fields for flesh, which they burie after they haue had their fill, to serue them when they want ought to prey vpon. When they be sicke, they know how to vse certaine herbes, to make them vomit, and to loosen their belly. And their custome is to assaile weake and fearfull persons that trauell alone, much rather then hunters. They are so known to the fishermen along the lake of Meotis (as Pliny reporteth) that these honest people are wont to giue them part of their fish, which if they faile to do, they will in the night seare and breake their nets. When the she wolfe hath young ones, if she find her selfe oppressed with dogs, or men, she taketh one of her whelps in her mouth to beare away, that she may not loose them all. And she neuer leaues them except the he wolfe remaine for their gard, going both by tornes out for victuals: & if they haue taken any beast, they bring it vnto their whelps, laying it down before them to feed vpon. If they be somewhat big, they will then bring home some lamb aliue, to makethem kill it, and teach them their craft. But I finde nothing more admirable in the nature of the wolfe then that which hath beene noted by the authour of the countrye farme, that there breed and engender certaine serpents in the kidnies of an old wolfe: which being growne doe at last worke their breeders death, and become very venomous things. Concerning the sublety and craft of wolues to intrap their preyes, it is very well knowne by euery one, being to the great hurt of people; but their industry is very great in forrests, where they can tel how to hunt the Hart and Does, watching them in fresh places, as hounds should do, yea they can direct themselues, like a course of grey hounds to watch and lurke in the borders of the wood, whilest others hunt within. Besides, it is a common thing, and many haue written thereof, yea Isidore himselfe, that if a wolfe espy a man before the man perceiue him, he can take away his voice, because that with his corrupt breath he infecteth the aire: which being so putrified doth also corrupt the breath of the man, neere to the said beast, whereby he remaineth deprived of voice, and hoarse, howsoeuer hee be endamaged therby: and that is it which hath begotten the common prouerbe (Lupus est in fabula) which is said, when one speaking of another, that comes in vnlooked for, doth hold his peace, as if that the other parties arriual had taken away his voice & speech. But if the wolfe be first seen by a man, it is thought that this malicious effect is not of so great power and that he looseth much of his fiercenes: the cause wherof may be that knowing himselfe discovered, he hath not the leisure to spread abroad his venom, and instead of running vpon the man, he deuileth how he may runne and flye from him. If this reason be of any value, I doe not thinke that it hath bin yet written by any one, at leastwise as I haue read or heard. There is also another kind of wolues, called Lynx, the furre of whom Princes weare, which (as Plinie saith) resemble other wolues, but that they are spotted like leopards. And Oppianus writeth that they are ingendred by a Wolfe and a Panther: yet that cannot be affirmed of the Lynx of Germany, for there are no Panthers.

The Beare is a beast, in whom many things are found worthie to bee noted. Barbarie and Newfound land nourisht a great number, whom the inhabitants doe hunt after diuers manners. But they doe chiefly entrap them by meanes of certaine deepe pits, couered ouer with leaues and branches, which they digge in the way that these beasts are accustomed to frequent, and especially neere vnto trees, where there is some swarme of Bees: for the Beare loueth bonie aboue all other meat, whether it be for that he delights to glut himselfe therewith, or else to heale the soreneesse of eyes whereto hee is very subiect: and so passing vpon these pits, hee falleth thereinto, and is there slaine by these Barbarians. The male when hee couereth the female, doeth embrace her, as man doeth woman; and the shee Beare being full doth retire apart into her den, not bearing aboue thirtie dayes, and doeth oftentimes bring forth siue Beare-whelps: which at first doe seeme to bee but an heape of white flesh, without any forme, without eyes, without haire, and is as small as a mouse, with some little apparance of nailes, but through very much licking the shee Beare reduceth them into such forme as they haue. When this beast is vnprovided of a cave, he buildeth his lodging with wood, of which he makes so huge an heap, and piles it so well that the raine cannot enter thereinto. After that he paues it, and makes his litter with the softest leaues of trees that he can find. In winter time the male keepeth within his den for fortie daies long, and neuer bougeth, and the female for foure moneths: and the first foureteene daies they sleepe so profoundly, that it is impossible to wake them, though they be beaten with staues: and one would not thinke how fat they then be: this time being past, they sit vpon their taile and liue of nothing else, but by sucking their forefeet. Being come forth of their den, they first eate of the herbe called Wake Robin, or Cuckow-pintle, to open their pipes, which are all as it were stopped vp. Their food is corne, leaues of trees, grapes grapes, apples, hony, circuses, and antes: which they vse especially licking them vpwith their tongues from off the ground, when they are sicke with eating the fruit of Mandrakes: for by this meanes they heale themselues. They go vpright vpon their hinder feet when they list, and descend downe trees backwards. And when they fight against the bul, or other horned beaſt, they hang themselues by all their fowre feet vpon them, and vpon their head, that they may thereby tire their enemy, and so vanquish him. To conclude, there is no creature more subtile in his simplicity.

Of the Ape and of the Hart.

But if we would speake of crafty beaſts: subtile in al agility and sport, then must we haue respect to the Ape. For nature hath bestowed very good sense and maruailous craft vpon him. Also he doth very neere approach to the shape of man, both in his forme of countenance, nose, eies, and ey-lids: the vnder part of which, there is no beaſt that hath except the Ape. He hath also nipples vpon his breast like a man, and vseth his hands and legs as man: hauing nailes and fingers made and disposed as ours, of which the middlemost is most longest. His intrails likewise are almost like to those of man. Africa & many Isles of the new found lands nourish these creatures in great plenty, and of diuers kindes, some whereof are called Monckies; and they haue long tailes: and others are lackes or Marmosets, and they haue none: they liue of herbes and corne: & when they mean to steale some eares of corne there assembl twenty or thirty of them together, and one staies for a scout out of the field, where he no sooner espieth the Lord of the ground to come, but he squeaks very loud, at whose cry all the rest runne away, and do saue themselues by nimble flight, climbing vp trees, and skipping from one to another, yea and the she apes, with their yong ones vpon their shoulders, will leape from tree to tree like the rest. And they are commonly so fond of their yong ones, that with too often embracing, and too much clasping them, they at last kil them. They which are tamed and taught, do maruailous & incredible things. Besides the author of the vniuersall Cosmography hath noted, that in the solitarie Island there are Apes, greater, vn happier, and wilder then are in all the world else, which bee named Magots: who being seene a farre off, a man would iudge them to be humane people. Whereupon he thinketh that some are a litle deceived, who haue written concerning Sauesges, & men being rough all ouer their bodies like goates, liuing vpon soailes and rawe flesh hauing perhaps taken such Magots, (because they haue not bin accrete to distinguish them,) for very men. But enough of this, I would haue you (ARAM) to pursue the subiect of our discourse.

Of the Ape.

Lib. 3. c. 16.

Of the Hart, of the Boore, and of the Vnicorne, Chapter 87.

ARAM. I Will now speake of the most gentle and simple beaſt of all the world, in his nature, and which neuerthelesse is indued with great force, which hee sometimes vseth to the cost of those who hunt him: and that is the Hart or Stagge, in whose chase great Lords take much pleasure. He is so simple that he museth, and is astonished at every thing: in such sort, as if hee see a Cowe or an Horse come neere vnto him, hee neuer taketh regard whorides him; or if he perceiue him, hee lookes downe at his feete, as if hee were amazed, what bowe and arrowes, or weapons soeuer he haue. Hee museth also at the songs and piping of shepheards. When Stagges be not in rut, they are very sharpe at their victuals: and feeling themselues fat, they search out solitary places apart, and there abide, knowing very well, that they are not then apt for the course, and that they are then also chiefly hunted. Being pursued, they do oftentimes stay their flight to take breath, and looke heere and there round about them; but when they perceiue the hounds that followe them, they runne as before. And they make these stoppes, by reason of a certaine pipe, which doeth greatly paine them, and which is so tender, that it presently breaketh with the least wound that may be. They endeavour to runne with the wind, that it may carry with them the sent away from the hounds, so that they may not easily take them. They heare a farre off, and haue a very good eare, when they stand vpon their feete: but if they lie downe, they be very deafe. Plinie recounteth, that when the harts or stags of Cilicia will passe from thence into Cyprus, they swimme ouer the Sea, but alwayes in troupes, and in order, resting the heades of the one vpon the crupper of the other, and that by turnes, in such sort,

Of the Hart

cap. 32.

that the hindermost goe before in their turne, and the foremost turne behinde: directing their course by the smell of the land, because they cannot see the shoare. The buckes onely are armed with hornes, and they alone of all beastes cast their hornes every spring time: yet some haue seene (but very seldome) horned does marked to twelue yeeres. When they feele that their hornes will fall, they seeke out the most solitary & desert places that they can find, whether it be to hide them because they are ashamed to haue lost their arms, or else to disappoint men of the benefit that doth redound vnto them therby, for their horne hath many properties in vse. And many say that of those hornes which harts cast: the right are neuer found againe, so that it is holden for certaine, that they bury their right horne. Their age is knowne by their heads, because that every yeere they haue a knag more, and there are some seene that are marked to two and twenty. Beyond which, none doth note their age, although they liue much longer. For histories record that about an hundred yeeres after the death of Alexander the Great, there was an Hart taken, about whose necke this Prince whilest he liued had put a collar of gold, and that he was growne so great afterwards, and so fat, that the said collar was hid within his flesh, & couered with his skin. Moreouer, stags doe change their place of abode, and their food according as the Sunne doeth approach in height. For in the moneth of Nouember, they keepe themselves to bushes and briers, the tops whereof they eate to restore their nature after they haue beene in rut. In December they withdraw themselves to the thickest of Forrests, which may defend them from the colde windes, snowes and yce. In Ianuary they cometo the borders of the Forrests, and to tilled lands, to feede on greene corne, as ry e, and such like. In February and March, because they loose and cast their hornes, they thrust themselves amongst the bushes, wherein they remaine al Aprill and May. In Iune and Iuly they goe into woods and corne fields, and then are they fattest. And in September and October they leaue their woods, and fall to rut: and then haue they neither any certaine place nor meate because they follow the waies which the does haue passed, liuing then with a little, and feeding vpon what they chance to meete with.

Of the Bore.

The Bore is another beast, in whose chase many exercise themselves, and take singular pleasure: But as the Hart is gentle and fearefull, so is the Boare hardie and furious, not fearing the dogs, but attendeth for them in quier, & oftentimes also he pursueth them, to teare them in pieces with his teeth; the biting whereof, chiefly in the chest of the body, is almost incurable. His place of abode is neuer certaine, and therefore some say hee is but a guest, because he doeth but run out of one Forrest and wood into another: and yet he delighteth to remaine in the same countrey and place where he was first farrowed: so that if any dogs chase him out of any wood or Forrest, hee presently runnes without any stay to his native place, which he supposeth to be his safeguard and refuge. The meat which he liketh best, is hasell nuts, beechmast, and acornes. His flesh is better then harts flesh: And therefore the ancient Romanes made such account thereof, that in their most magnificent bankets, they would serue in the whole Bores to be set vpon the table. Yet Pliny saith, that the Bores of the mountaines in Pamphilia and Cilicia, hauing eaten Salamanders, become very venomous, in such sort, as they poyson those that eat of their flesh. Besides, when these beastes feelee themselves more heauy then of custome, they seeke for Iuie, and eate thereof: or else for crabs, which they finde in sand when the sea ebbs. The sow or female beareth but once a yeare, although the Bore be very apt to couer her. And the Author of the foresaid naturall History doth affirme vnto vs, that in the Indies there are very great wild Bores, which haue two tuskes in their mouth of a cubite long, and two other that issue out of their front like the hornes of a cow. And Cardanus saith, that in the same Countrey there are Bores like to others in forme, in voice and manners, and in their litteridge, which are growne in two moneths, and yet are smaller then conies, and can scarce bite: differing nothing from other, saue that they haue five or sixe toes vpon their feet instead of nailes.

But let vs leaue these fierce beastes, to consider vpon some others, and let vs speake first of the Vnicorne, which at this day is so greatly esteemed of, the horne of whom is holden of great vertue in Phisicke, and singular against all poysons. Plinie describeth the Vnicorne, to haue a bodie altogether like an Horse, an head like an Hart, feete of an Elephant, and the taile of a Bore, bearing an horne in the midst of his front, of two cubits in length: and he saith that these beastes are nourished in the land of the Orsians in India. Lewes de Barthelema in his nauigations into Arabia, affirmeth that he did at Meca see two Vnicornes: and saith that the body and colour of this beast is like an horse, of a darke gray, hauing feete

clouen before, and hoofed like a goat. And that these two beasts had beene given to the Soldan of Meca, for a very rich and precious present, by a king of Ethiopia, to the end to haue peace with him. Belon hath obserued out of the testimonies of diuers authors, that there are two sorts of beasts, who beare one horne onely; one of which is the asse of India, which hath not clouen feete; and the other is the Orix, being a kinde of goate, that hath clouen feete. And he maketh mention of many Vnicornes hornes, esteemed to bee of verie great price: especially of two, which are in the treasure of Saint Markes at Venice; each of them beeing of a cubit and a halfe long, the greatest end whereof exceedeth not aboue three inches ouer. He speaketh also of that which our king hath, which is at Saint Denis, being seuen foote long, and waigheth thirteene pounds, and fower ounces, in fashion like a taper, being broad at the lower end about a palme and three fingers, and so groweth lesse and lesse towards the end, and hath a pit in the great end aboue a foot deepe, which is the place, wherein the bone is fastned that holds it firme to the head of the beast that beareth it. But this author doth mocke at the folly of those, who many times doe buie pieces of bone, which are cut of teeth of the Roheart, and of the hornes and ribs of many other beasts, for true Vnicornes horne, paying sometimes for one of these little pieces three hundred ducats: so much is Vnicornes horne esteemed, being most excellent for many vses in phisicke. Theuet also flouteth at these abuses, and at many fables inuented vpon this matter: alleadging that he had seene an horne taken from a beast of a cleane contrary shape to that, which the Vnicorne is described to be of, whereto the same vertue was neuertheless attributed. And that the countrey of the Sauages breedeth a beast called Pyraissouppi, as big as the foale of a Mule hauing almost such an head, as rough as a Beare and clouen footed like an Hart, which beareth two long straight hornes, that doe come neere to Vnicornes horne, and wherewith the Sauages cure themselues when they be bitten and wounded by venemous beasts and fishes. But now chaunge we our talke, and (*ACHITO*B) let vs heare you speake againe concerning some of the most rare and woorthie beastes of the Earth.

Of the Hiena or Ciuet cat, of the Muske cat, of the Beauer, and of the Otter.
Chapter. 88.

ACHITOB. In our discourses wee haue any worthy matter, whereinto admire the workes of God in the nature which he hath ordained vnto them, we shall find no lesse in the consideration of these, wherof I purpote now to speak, the odour of whom is very sweete. And amongst the rest the Ciuet cat called by auncients the Hiena, is worthy of great maruell. For from her commeth an excrement so odoriferous, that alsoone as it is smelt, doth pierce through all the senses and spirits, and serueth to compose very excellent perfumes. This beast fashioned like a Bedouant but of bigger bodie, hauing blacke haire about the necke, and long the ridge of her backe, which shee setteth vp right being angry. Shee is mouthed like a cat, and hath fierie and redde eies with two blacke spots vnder them, and round eares like vnto those of a Badger. Besides shee hath white haire, full of blacke spots vpon her bodie, with a long taile blacke aboue, but hauing some white spots vnderneath. The auncients haue spoken of this beast as of a wilde cat, and Iohn Leo in his description of Africke, doth name her so, saying that shee is common in the woods of Aethiopia, where the people do catch her with heryong, whome they nourish in cages with milke, and porridge made of branne and flesh: and that they receive ciuet from her twise or thrise a day, which is the sweate of this beast: for they beate her with a little sticke, making her leape vp and downe about the cage, till such time as shee doth sweate, which they take off from vnder her thighes, and taile, and that is it which is called ciuet. Belon reporteth to haue seene one in Alexandria, so tame, that playing with men, she would bite their noses, eares and lips, without doing them any harme: and that she was alwayes nourished with womens milke. Mathiolus likewise saith, that hee hath seene many Ciuet Cats at Venice, which had been brought out of Syria, and attributeth certaine properties to their excrements, for which cause they haue beene more sought after now, then in the dayes of our fathers: so that they are nourished at this day even in France. Cardanus also maketh mention of a beast called Zibetum, which is found in Spaine, that is like to a cat, and carrieth a bladder in her members, the seede whereof is receiued into a spoone, beeing of so excellent an odour, that three drops thereof surmounteth the waight of three pounds of any odoriferous tree.

Of the Muske
cat.

But the Muske cat doth yet surpasse all other odour, and meriteth all maruell in the nature therof. For it is a beast like vnto a goat in forme and haire, but that she is of a more blewish colour, and hath but one horne, and is bigger of body. There are many in Africa, but chiefly in Tumbasco and Sini. When this beast is in rut, with the heat and rage that he then endureth, his nauell swelleth, and filleth it selfe with a certaine blood, in maner of an impostume: which at length through much wallowing, and rubbing against trees, hee maketh to breake, out of which runneth this blood, being halfe corrupted, which in tract of time becommeth very odoriferous. And the people of the countrey doe gather it amongst stones, or vpon the stocks of trees, as the best muske that is: because it is full ripe, after that it hath rested some certaine time out of the body of the beast which engendreth it, and that it hath bin perfectly concocted by the sun; which the other muske cannot be, that is taken out of the liuing beast, after that it is catched in chase. And therefore this most precious muske is shut vp & referued in boxes, and in the bladders of such of these beasts, as haue at any time beene taken, to serue to such vses as it is fit for: whereupon commeth that there are muskes very different in goodnesse. For there is but little brought to vs in true bladders of this perfect muske, being ripe, and gathered as before saide: but all the flesh of this beast being beaten together with the bones, is commonly put into an old bladder, and sold vs for pure muske. Which wee may very well know in that we vsually finde little peeces of bone in our muske. And yet this same thus prepared smelleth so sweetely, that wee may easily iudge, how precious and exquisite the odour of the true and perfect muske is.

Of the Castoreum.

The Castoreum which proceedeth from the Beuer, is also very much esteemed for the vertue of the sent thereof. This beast is as bigge as a dogge, long, gentle, of blacke and shining haire, with a very long taile, and feete like a goose, hauing strong teeth, and so sharpe, that he vseth them as a saw to saw and cleaue timber, whereof he maketh himselfe a lodging with maruailous cunning. They are found neere to the riuer of Iller, or Danubius, and neere to the Rhine also, and in many places of Africke. In his stones doth lie a most exquisite licour, which is proper to him: And therefore Plinie reporteth, that the Beuer feeling himselfe oppressed with hunters, biteth off his stones with his teeth, as if he knew

Hist. nat lib. 8
c. 30.
De subt. li. 10

wherefore hee were pursued: and that is it which Philosophers call Castoreum. Cardanus affirmeth that this beast is a kinde of Otter, euen as house wels are a kinde of wild wels. For (saith he) in one selfe same kinde of beasts, nature doth by little and little conuert it selfe from small to great ones, from foule to faire ones, and from weake to strong ones.

Of the otter.

Besides the Otter (called by Plinie Lutra) liueth commonly in the earth, and in the water, and hath haire softer then feathers: and his stones are fit and profitable for the same that Castoreum is. But (as Matthiolus hath very well noted) the vse of strange compositions doeth bring many discommodities to those, which thinke to serue themselues therewith, because they are either sophisticate, or corrupted before they come to vs. And therefore he saith, that the vse of Pontick or common Castoreum, which is black with rotnennes and putrifaction, is very venemous. But me thinketh (companions) that we stretch out too long our discourse concerning terrestriall beasts, considering that we haue not vnderaken to write a perfect history of them, but onely to set before our eyes some of the most rare and most excellent, to make vs meditate vpon, and to admire the workes of God. There are many authors out of which one may gather the entire knowledge of liuing creatures, and especially out of Aristotle, who hath described their nature in fiftie Books, by the commandement of Alexander the great; & after him, Plinie hath declared vnto vs in his natural History many things concerning the same subiect, which were not known before. Wherefore as when wee entreated of the Spheres and Meteors, wee referred all to the true Astronomie and Philosophie of Christians: so let vs now doe as much vpon our discourse concerning beastes, reducing all that which wee haue spoken to an inward meditation vpon the prouidence of God, considering that the effects thereof do continually appeare in the commoditie, profite, and vtilitie which redound vnto vs by these creatures, yea, by the most venemous of them: as (A SER) you may giue vs to vnderstand.

Of the right vse of venemous creatures, and wilde beasts: and of the iustice and bountie of God which shineth in them.

Chapter. 89.

AS E. VEE must needs beleue for a principle, that if sinne had not entred into the world, there had neuer any creature beene hurtfull vnto man. For hee had beene a peaceable Lord and master of all living things, and all things had beene obedient vnto him, if hee had beene obedient vnto God, as he ought to haue beene. Wee haue a cleere testimony thereof, after the fall of Adam, in those beasts which came vnto Noah at the flood, to enter and remaine within the arke with him: as also in those lions into whose denne Daniel was cast. But as man hath beene very rebellious towards God, not acknowledging him for his Lord, according as duty did require him: euen so all creatures, which should shewe obedience to man, not onely haue beene, and are rebellious towards him, but do also many times make warre against him, and do greatly annoy him, euen according as it pleaseth the soueraigne Lord to chastice and punish the sinnes of men, by meanes of them. In this sort then must wee thinke vpon venemous and cruell beasts, who doe not onely seeke to hurt vs, but doe also serue the wicked, where-with to compound their poisons. For wee behold how God hath created many and diuers kindes of them, who beeing good in their nature, inso much as they haue all beene created by God, and in that hee is a worker, who cannot performe any euill businesse, they doe neuerthelesse oftentimes greatly hurt men, in steade of ministring aide vnto them, yea they do sometimes also worke their death. And therefore we must consider, that the fault doth not proceede from the creature created good, but from the sinne of man, being punished by the iust iudgement of God, by such scourges of his iustice, as it pleaseth him to make choise of: the worke neuerthelesse, which hee hath done by his creatures remaining good, inso-much as it serueth to chastice those, who do deserue it.

Genes. 7.

Dan. 6.

There are in earth, and in the sea many very venemous beasts, who by their poison kill men, as are serpents, vipers, scorpions, and such like. And although it may seeme that these creatures haue beene created onely but to doe hurt: yet hath not God giuen their beeing without good and iust reason. For hee hath so well disposed all things, that venims and poisons themselues serue very well for many other vses then to kill, and im-poison: for they are profitable and necessarie in many occasions, and serue for medicines and remedies in diuers accidents. And concerning their particular effects, which turne to the damage of man, besides that which wee haue said, that they are instruments of the diuine vengeance vpon sinne; God will thereby moreover make them acknowledge, and perceiue their infirmity, and what all humaine power is, when it riseth vp against his maiestie, and that men thinke to resist him. For who may be so dull, and dis-furnished of reason, that cannot vnderstand how vnsure their life is, and how feeble their force and power, considering that there needeth but some small venemous herbe, or some little portion of other venom and poison, or the stinging of some small beast, or the biting of some others, which are but as wormes creeping vpon the earth. I doe not onely say greatly to torment, but also to bereaue of life the greatest, and most fearefull giant, or prince in all the world. Herein then haue we a goodly example to teach vs to know what we are, what we can do, and how wee must feare, and be in continuall doubt, though we suppose our selues to bee neuer so strong and mightie. And wee may also instruct our selues, when we behold that there is no man so assured but that is somewhat moued; and receiueth some feare, yea and many times very much, at the onely sight and meeting of an adder, or viper, or of some other venemous beast. We may also imagine that if the eternall creator of every soule, doth shew himselfe so much to be feared in such small and vile creatures, who doe not sub-sist, nor retaine any power; but such as proceedeth from him, what might this bee in comparison of his whole puissance, if he would declare it vpon his enemies? But indeede this neede not, because hee can doe his pleasure by far lesse force: as when hee was displeased with the proud arrogancie, and peruerse obstinacie of Pharaoh, and of the Egyptians, who held the God of the Hebrewes in disdain; hee would not warre vpon them with great armies of men; but did onely raise vp trou-pes of frogs, of flies, and of lice, against which the proud tyrants could not resist, but remained vanquished. Againe, how did he after that chastice his people in the wildernesse by fiery serpents? How many times afterwards did hee bring many people into extreme necessity, as if a strong army, or fire had passed through their countrey, and that onely by canker wormes, catter pillars, grasse hoppers, and such like vermine, where-with he threatneth those that rebell against his statutes? And doe wee not consider what vexation oftentimes flies, lice, wormes, rats and mice, do put vs vnto? Haue we not goodly occasion to be proud, high minded, and to esteeme much of our selues, seeing that there is not so much power in vs as to inuent the meanes how to defend and saue our selues from such little creatures, who trouble vs day and night, both at home and abroad? And may wee not hereby iudge, how we could defend our selues from woules, beares, lions, tigers & other savage and wilde beasts, in whom there is no doubt, but that wee haue very euident signes and testimonies proposed of the wrath and fury of God? For who is so stout that is not much scared to encounter with, or to beare the voice onely of any of these beasts? We know that God hath menaced the transgressours of his commandements with them. For he saith thus, [I will send the teeth of beastes vpon thee, with the venom of serpents creeping in the dust. And so hath he oftentimes done in the land of Samaria, and in Iudea, yea not sparing the young children, as was declared in them, who were deuoured by the Beares, because they mocked the Prophet Elizans. How many such examples of the wrath of God doe Histories set before their eyes, that haue beene executed in the daies of our fathers, yea amongst vs, who cannot bee ignorant, how that many times Woules haue deuoured little children, digging downe the houle sides for them, they being close by their parents. Wherefore the Lord did say by Amos, [The lion hath roared, who will not bee afraid? The Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesie?] Let vs learne two things: first, that if the onely voice of the lion terrifie those which beare it, by much more reason must the word of God moue vs. Secondly, that the true seruants of God cannot be silent when the Lord shall haue commanded them to speake: but will attribute all glory to his name not standing in feare of venomous serpents, wilde beastes, and other scourges of his wrath, but dreading the Omnipotent onely, who executeth vengeance vpon the wicked, when, and how he pleaseth.

And as by this discourse, we must acknowledge the image of God being angry, and the patterne of his fury in al those creatures, which may hurt vs, and how much he is to be feared & dreaded in his most high Maiestie, considering that his iudgements are so terrible, being executed but by the smallest creatures of the earth: so on the other side must wee consider vpon the great bountie and benignitie of God, of which hee giues vs testimonies, not onely in beasts created to the onely purpose to serue and profit man; but also in those which seeme not to haue beene made; but onely for their hurt. For as we haue already said, venims and poysons may serue to many other vses, then to kill men, and venomous beasts are not so full of poyson throughout all their bodie, but that they may profit in sundry occasions: witnesse the viper (a most fearefull serpent) whose flesh is very requisite in the composition of true treacle, which is a most soveraigne remedie against all venom and poyson. And there are many verie dangerous diseases, against which this flesh of the viper and of other serpents is very profitable, according to the testimonie of phisitions. Who likewise teach, that the Scorpion (whose stinging is mortall) carrieth with him the true remedie for health, if hee be brayed, and laide vpon the wound which hee hath made; or else if being burnt, the ashes of him be drunke with wine. But how many rare properties doe they assigne to the oyle which is made of scorpions? In briebe to speake in a word, there is no beast so venomous, none so savage, none so cruell, be it great or small, by which men may not receiue much profit, if their nature were well knowne. All which wee may better learne, if we consider how that many creatures are nourished with that, which to others is venom and poison: the discourse whereof (A M A N A.) let vs receiue from you.

Of the nourishment of many animals, by that which is venom and poyson to others, and of the naturall amitie and enimity which is amongst them Chap. 90.

A M A N A. I T may seeme to many, that hornets, caterpillers, canker wormes, grasse hoppers, spiders, and such like vermin, were not created to any other ende, saue to endamage men: but though wee doe omit a thousand properties, which all these creatures haue by nature seruing to vse in phisicke, and that wee doe but onely consider, how they serue for food and nourishment to many other creatures: yet shall we in this haue enough wherein to acknowledge the profit, which doth retorne vnto vs from most vile and contemptible creatures, and by so much the more magnifie the providence of God who ordaineth all things for our good, For it is very certaine, that these small creatures (which otherwise seeme to bee vnprofitable) doe serue for food and meate to birds and fowles, and to such fishes as wee doe ordinarily eate of, so that we may rightfully say, that wee our selues are nourished by catterpillers, grasshoppers, and such other vermine, considering that wee eate those beasts that deuoure them, and doe liue vpon them. Let vs but onely note the meate which Turkie cockes, and other common fowles, whom wee so carefully bring vp for vs to feede vpon, do most seeke after. Certainly, there is no beast which eateh more vncleanly and filthy meate, for they spare neither serpents nor toads: and yet wee esteeme of their flesh, eggs and chickens, as of very good and delicate meat. This is in truth a marvellous kinde of naturall chymistrie and inimitable art, to so sublimatethat which of it selfe is poison, and would proue so to man, that hauing passed through the limbecke and fire of a small creature, it is not onely purged thereby from all annoyance but doth also sustaine life, and serue afterwards for wholesome nouriture to man. And doe wee not beholde, that the nightingall and the wood sparrowe (are fat with eating venomous spiders) which serue both for meat and a medicine to them? Plinie hath written, that deere and quails do feede vpon poyson, and yet euery one knoweth that their flesh is a delicious kinde of meate. But what another wonder is this which the same author declarereth, that there be certaine beasts which are not venomous of themselves, and yet are dangerous meat, when they haue eaten any venomous beast or herbe? For in the mountaines of Pamphilia and of Cilicia, the bores that haue eaten Salamanders, are very venomous in such sort as they poyson those who eate of their flesh: and yet they themselves can conuert such poyson to their owne nourishment. What reason can we giue of so excellent a secret in the nature of beasts? I haue neuer yet learned any reason of the Philosophers. Let vs then stay at the admirable effects of the providence of God, who in those beasts, which we doe commonly eate for our sustenance, doth performe this marvellous chymistrie whereof wee now spake, and who causeth the force of poysons to bee spent in the deserts, to the small hurt of man, to the end that his omnipotencie, bounty and benignity may be declared in all things towards vs.

10. c. 7.

Moreover, haue we not also worthy matter, whereby to giue glory to his name, in that he hath created the beasts so different in nature, with a naturall and secret amitie, and enimitie which they doe greatly beare one towards another? For it is very certaine, that God maketh all this serue to the profit and commoditie of men: in so much as there is a kinde of amitie commonly in priuate and tame beasts, towards such as they are, all seruing him who hath bene established for their master: and that enimitie doth rather remaine amongst wilde beasts, as also in tame beasts towards the wilde: In such sort as many sauage beasts, which doe nothing but harme, haue by this meanes many of their owne kinde their aduersaries to make head against them, and to resist them in whatsoever they would doe. But we may especially wonder in that the most mightie, great and strong beasts, yea the most furious and cruell are commonly put in feare, by the smallest and most weake. For what is an hog in regard of an Elephant? or a cocke in respect of a lyon? there seemeth to be no comparison betwixt them: And yet the onely voice and grunting of an hog maketh the Elephant afraide, and the lion is not onely seized with feare at the crowing of the cocke, but is much troubled when he seeth him but set vp his crest. Also there are verie little beastes, who doe not onely put verie great and cruell ones in feare, but doe also kill them: as the Ichneumon, which is a little Rat of India, doeth kill the great and cruell crocodile (a most dangerous serpent) cleauing and piercing his belly, after it is secretly entered thereinto thorough the mouth of this beast, which is able to deuoure men, and yet striketh no feare into this feeble creature. Which (as Plinie recordereth) hath another warre against the Aspis, ouer whom it remaineth victorious by this meane. It doeth many times wallowe and tumble in the dirt, and as many times doth drie it selfe in the sunne: then feeling it selfe sufficiently armed with slime, it assaileth the Aspis, alwaies holding vp the taile against him, to receiue the blowes thereupon, which the serpent shall strike, wherewith hee can in no wise offend the bodie of the Ichneumon: in the meane space it picketh out some such fit place to strike him through the throat, that he therewith dieth: and presently after it doeth prepare it selfe, as before, to fight with another. In this discourse we may behold a perfect image of humane things, considering that we cannot be ignorant, how that it commeth oftentimes to passe, that God abateth the most mightie and strong tyrants, by the most lowly and abiect persons; and Kings, Princes, and highest esteemed people, by meane and very lowe esteemed men. And let vs also note, that although the amitie and enmitie amongst living creatures, proceedeth from a certaine instinct of nature, so disposed by the creator, and the causes whereof are either hidden, or hardly knownen: that neuertheless, the best reason, and most certaine which may be alledged concerning those examples, which wee haue heere touched, is, that God would declare vnto vs in them, how he doeth mocke at the pride and arrogancie of men, and at all their puissance and force. For if he bestowe so much power vpon little beastes, as to affright, yea even to slay the most furious, and that hee can overthrow, and destroy the most stout and valiant amongst men, by their owne selues, how much more should he astonish them, if with his almightie hand hee should beat downe their pride, and punish their sinnes in his ire? Though the people (saith the Prophet) rage and murmure; though Kings band themselves, and Princes be assembled together against the Lord, yet hee that dwelleth in the heavens shall laugh, the Lord shall haue them in derision, also they shall perish in the way, when his wrath shall suddenly burne.

Now concerning that, which particularly respecteth the amitie betwixt priuate and domesticall beastes, and their hate towards those that are wilde, although that the neereft cause be very euident (as that they do loue one another, because they are nourished together, and receiue no damage one from another, hating the wildenesse of those, who desire to deuoure them) yet must wee passe farther, and acknowledge another more remote, and yet most certaine cause therein, which is a naturall instinct to conserue and multiplie their owne kind for the vtility and seruice of man, according as the bountie and benignitie of our God hath by his admirable providence disposed of their nature, wherupon let vs heare you (A. R. A. M.) plot out the subiect of your discourse.

Of the vtility that commeth vnto men by beasts, and chiefly by priuate and domesticall tame beasts, and of the wonderfull providence of God which declareth it selfe in them. Chapter 91.

Of the commodity that men haue by tame beasts.

A. R. A. M. Sithence God hath so disposed all things by his providence for the good, and commodity of men, that they may receive some profite even out of the most venomous, cruell and sauage beasts, as we haue already heard: we may in no wise doubt (as indeede experience doth daily teach vs) but that they doe receive great aide and helpe from priuate and tame beasts, as are sheepe, kine, oxen, bulles, asses, mules, horses and such like. For wee are serued with their labours, and trauaile, with their fruite, with their flesh, with their wool, and with their skinnies. For from whence receive wee our clothing, except linnen, but from beasts? With how many sorts of wooles and of skins doe they furnish vs? And from whence haue wee the silkes, cloth, and workes which are made and which serue to cloath the most stout and proud tyrants, and other princes of the earth? Haue wee them not by the industry of wormes, and small vermine? In very truth, we may very well say, that wormes cloath wormes, and that the most stately amongst men doe take from the most vile amongst creatures the substance of their brauerie and pomp. For what are men, but poore wormes of the earth, who to make themselves a little excell the rest, do take from other wormes the ornaments of their magnificence? And if wee consider what commodity the milke which is drawne from some beasts doeth deliuer vnto a thousand thousand persons, if wee consider of the great multitude that there is of all kinde of fourefooted beastes, of birdes and of fishes, all which doe serue vs for foode and nourishment in diuers manners: if how many sundry tastes and saouours wee finde in all these meates of different natures, according to the tastes, complexions and dispositions of men, and which are so tempered, that they be good for those that are in health, for those that are sicke, for great, for small, for yong, for olde: shall we not bee rauished with all these wonders, thereby to giue glorie to the soueraigne Creator and moderator of all nature? What shall shall we more say in that the skins of earthly beasts, are of so many diuers colours, and so well compact, either of woole, or of haire, or of good skins, of the variety & diuersity that there is in the feathers of birds, and in the colors of them, & in their songs, which minister much pleasure to melancholy persons: are not these so many excellent testimonies of the power of the omnipotent; who created all these things through his bounty & benignity towards vs? Surely there is nothing so vile and contemptible in the least creature that is, but doth preach the Maiesty of God vnto vs. And therefore he said vnto his seruant Iob, [Hast thou giuen the pleasant wings vnto the peacocks? or wings and feathers vnto the Ostrich?] For we see, that they which will decke themselves do put vpon their heads the faire plumes of the Ostrich, and of other foules, which are sold very deere: also euery one admireth the taile of the peacock, wherwith he sets forth himselfe, which he turneth like as into a wheele or a roundell, being so gallantly garnished, that there seeme to be as many eyes or sunnes, as there be feathers therein.

I speake not heere of the nature of beasts, nor of the industry which God hath giuen to euery one of them, to know what is conuenient or hurtfull for them, and to couet the one and auoid the other: as also how they are furnished with care and power, to preserue their life, and the liues of their young ones. But I will here bring into the number one of the least and most common sort, which wee behold euery day in our houses: for perhaps the consideration thereof will not be altogether vnprofitable vnto vs; and that is the cock. If any question be made concerning his beauty, in what birde may wee finde more, bee it, that wee consider of his plumage, and the diuersity of colours, which is commonly therein, or of his faire kingly crest, or his stately pace and braue carriage, which cannot bee more magnificent in the greatest monarch of the world? And if this birde were not so common, but were very seldome seene, there are but few other creatures which would bee preferred before him, although there were nothing worthy of consideration in his nature, saue that which wee haue already declared. What shall wee say then if wee will but meditate, of what heart and courage hee is in fight? Is there any other creature which can lesse endure to bee overcome, and is more ashamed thereof? Againe, what curtesie vseth hee amongst the hennas, with whom hee is conuersant? and how much doth hee loue them, euen to prouide for meate to feede them, and to take it out of his owne beake, to giue vnto them, calling them when hee hath found it, as the henne calleth her little chickens together: But that which I finde most strange in him, is the agreement which by nature hee hath with the Sunne, which is such, as one may very well thinke, that hee hath some naturall Astronomy and Astrology, which is bred in him. For hee vnderstandeth and perceiueth the course and motion of the heaven and of the Sunne, and when his rising doth approach, so that hee declareth it by his crowing, very timely in the morning, and that diuers times before any other creature can perceiue it; yea or men themselves, except they rise out of their beddes to behold the sky. And yet for all that they must haue obtained some knowledge of the course and of the motion of heaven; either by the science of Astronomy, or through long vse and continuall obseruations thereof, as is with shepherds, and those that watch in the fields. But if the heavens bee covered with cloudes what can the most expert of them know therein, saue by meanes of clocks; which they haue in their houses? The cocke then is more skillfull in this art. For without euer moouing from the place where he is at roost to sleep, and what weather soeuer there be, faire or fowle, yet doth not hee faile to sound out the chimes at his howers, so as there is no clocke so certaine: and he serueth also for one to them that haue no other. And therefore we may very well say, that how many cocks there are in the world, so many naturall and domesticall clockes are they for those who haue them in their houses. And doe we not see how that souldiers, especially Almaines doe commonly carry these creatures with them, to serue as a trumpet to the to sound out the approach of day. But the cocke did not serue for a clocke only to S. Peter, but for a preacher also, to recall in to his memory the words, which he had heard of his master, and for to draw him out of his sinne, and to induce him to true repentance as he did. And the like ought wee to doe, so often as this bird croweth in the morning, not onely to thinke our selues aduertised of the approach of the sunne, which bringeth vs the temporall day, after the darknes of the night but we must euery day wake out of the sleepe of sin, wherein we are so soundly laide; and prepare and dispose our selues to receiue Iesus Christ, the true Sunne of iustice, which bringeth vs the eternall & perpetuall day, that is neuer changed into night; & the light which cannot be obscured by darknes. By this brieue discourse then we may iudge how many excellent matters we should find to entreat vpon concerning the nature of liuing things, to make vs still more and more acknowledge the wonders of the prouidence of God, if wee would pursue to the full, that which might be said concerning this matter in searching out the secrets of the diuers faculties of creatures. But we will content our selues onely to adde to this which wee haue saide, that which well deserueth to bee considered of in this place, concerning the multiplication of such beasts as are most profitable for men, and by whom they receiue most commodities, whereupon (ACHITOB) let vs heare you presently discourse.

Other considerations to the same purpose.

ACHITOB. The holy Scripture teacheth vs, how that God after hee had created the beasts, he blessed them, saying, [Increase and multiply, and fill the waters, and the earth.] And that afterwards when the deluge had ouerwhelmed euery liuing soule, saue Noah, and his family, and two of euery kinde of beasts; God likewise repeated the same benediction of them, saying, [Bring forth fruite and multiply, and fill the earth.] Through which word that admirable fruitfulness, which wee beholde in all creatures, did first come, and is for euer conserued. Wherein, if wee haue any woorthy matter deliuered vnto vs to acknowledge the prouidence, bountie, and benignitie of God towards men, it is principally in this point which is notorious vnto all, that the vertue of this blessing hath been such, that those beasts, from whom wee might receiue most commoditie, and which are most tame and familiar, haue much more multiplied, then the other wilde and cruell beasts, who might bring any perill or endomagement vnto vs. Whereto GOD himselfe had in some sort a regard, when hee commaunded Noah to enter the arke, and to take of cleane beasts, seuen and seuen, male and female: but of vncleane beasts, two and two onely. So that by this meane, there did most remaine of the number of those, the vse of whom was most necessarie for man: giuing vs also a certaine testimony of his fatherly bounty to vs, by which hee is induced to haue respect vnto vs in all things.

But if wee consider what fecunditie there is in certaine sauage beasts, and yet how it vanissheth, and is surmounted by the multiplication of the other sort (wherewith we serue our selues) by a certaine kind of manner, which is altogether incomprehensible vnto vs: there is no person but will finde himselfe rauished in the contemplation thereof. For let vs take for instance the wolues onely. It is certaine, that they are more fertile then sheepe, kine, and other private and domesticall beasts, which serue for the maintenance of our life, and to other vses for the commoditie of the same. For the sheepe doeth bring forth, and nourish but one lambe, the cowe one calfe, the mare one foale, and so of the rest: whereas the wolfe bringeth forth and nourissheth many whelpes. Moreouer, none of those tame beasts, nor no man himselfe doeth eate any wolues: but they, and many other wilde beasts, which liue vpon prey, yea man himselfe, doe eate vp lambes, sheepe, kine, and their calves, and many times foales escape not: and yet we neuerthelesse doe daily behold, how all these poore beasts, which are a continuall prey to men and other creatures, doe increase and multiply each one more in his kinde, then wolues and other cruell beasts, who eate and deuoure them. Are not these then admirable effects of the prouidence of God, the reason whereof doeth surpasse the capacite of our vnderstanding? In very trueth these things are no lesse woonderfull (although there bee great diuersitie of the subject) then the multiplication of the people of Israel amongst the Egyptians, which was by so much the greater, by how much the more they were oppressed by tyrannie and cruell dealing.

Let vs also note, how that this eternall wisdome fauouring the fertilitie of those beasts, that are most profitable for man, hath assigned to such as liue vpon prey and rapine, an habitation in desert and obscure places, in rockes, caues, and in denues. For so it pleased God to separate them from the other, to the ende that they might the lesse annoy them. Moreouer, hee sundred them amongst themselves: in such sort that they doe not liue together gether in companies, as others do, that they might not ouerrun them. For wolues, beates, lyons, and such like doe not communicate one with the other, as priuate and domesticall beasts do: because they cannot agree one with another, as the peaceable & innocent beasts. So likewise eagles, haukes, faulcons, and other birdes of prey, do not flie together in volec and troopes, as pigeons, cranes, geese, and such like do, which serue vs for food. Thereupon then ensueth, that wilde beasts cannot gather so much power, as to hurt the other, vpon whom they make continuall warre: and who by this meanes are often saued from peril. Let vs adde in regard of birds, that they of prey are not so fruitfull as those which are giuen vs for foode. Witnes the great number of chickens which the hen doth hatch at one time, and the number of the young ones of partridges and quails, in comparison of those who fly to deuoure them. And although doves do bring forth but one at a time, yet they recompence that, in so much as they breed almost euery moneth in the yeere. In meditation then vpon these things, we must consider what, and how great the bounty of God is towards vs: and that all his creatures must be as so many preachers still to announce vnto vs the puif- sance and infinite wisdom of him; and as mirrors wherein hee presenteth himselfe euery where before our eies. And when we serue him not according to our duty, we are wel wor- thy to be set to schoole to such masters, as being beasts, more brute, more wild, more sauage then they who liue with vs, and are created for to serue vs. It is then as Isay said to the Isra- elites who were ingratefull and rebellious against their God, [The ox knoweth his owner, and the asse his masters crib: but Israell hath not knowne, my people hath not vnderstood.] And indeed in these 2. kinds of creatures we haue a goodly example to raise vs out of our sloth and ingratitude towards God, if we do but consider onely, what benefits do redound vnto vs by the seruice which we haue of oxen in tilling of our lands, and drawing of carts & wagons, and by asses in bearing al loades & burdens which are laid vpon their backs. Where- in we are also to esteeme of the providence of God, in regard of the forme of the bodies, & members of these beasts. For he hath so disposed them, that their onely composition & fi- gure doth admonish men of the works wherein these creatures must be employed, and of the vses, whereto they must be put. For oxen do cleere shew vs, that their backe is not fit to beare packs nor saddle, but that their necks is fit for the yoke, and their shoulders to draw carts and wagons, whereby one may easily iudge as also by their heauines, that they are vn- fit to beare burdens like the asse: whose backe, head and shoulders, are apt for the same.

Moreouer shall we not consider of the great bounty, and providence of God, in that he hath created the puissant and strong buls so docible, that men doe easily teach them to leaue all their fiercenes, and make them so tame, that a little young boy shall lead them like sheepe, and put the yoke vpon their necke, couple them, and make them labor as he listeth. This may make vs wonder at the indocility and wildnes of man, heeing so difficult to correct and tame. For wee see that one onely childe can easily direct a great troupe of beasts, bee they oxen or bulles, and gouerne them himselfe. But contrariwise, the nature of man is so vatoward, that many masters and gouernors are scarce sufficient to guid one onely childe. And what may we more say, in that all the government of these beasts is done without any neede to muzzle their mouthes, or to tie or fasten them in chaines or halters, and without keeping them in bits and bridles like horses, which men tame by such meanes? Surely we need not doubt, but if God had not ordained by his providence, that oxen and buls should serue men in those vses whereto they would employ them, that wee should be able to draw no more seruice out of them, then out of the wildest beasts that are in the world. By so many testimonies then, as wee haue in the nature of beasts, of the puif- sance, bounty and benignitie of the Creator of all things: let vs conclude, that we may very well say to all such as doe not consider vpon the so admirable workes of God, and vpon his providence therein, that which Iob said to his friends, speaking thus, [Aske the beasts, and they shal teach thee: or speak to the earth, and it shall shew thee; and to the fishes of the sea, and they shall declare vnto thee, who is ignorant of all these, but that the hand of the Lord hath made all these?] And to morrow (companions) wee will take a view of the goodly riches and treasures, which are hidden within the entrailes and precious stones, the dis- course whereof (A SER.) you shall begin.

ASER.

S we haue already contemplated those things, which appeare to be most rare vpon the earth; so do we now desire somewhat to refresh our spirits by the consideration of those things which are hidden within the in-trailles thereof. That then shall bee the subiect of our discourse for this day, to the end that as the contemplation of the highest heauens did open an entrance into our discourse, so we should conclude it, by a treatise vpon that, which is within the earth, neere to the center of this great Vniuers: to witte, vpon mettals & stones. Not that we intend to speake of the, as by a particular description of their nature & species: for then I dare affirme that there are so many kinds of mettals engédred within the earth, that they cannot be particularly described: and sith that nature adorneth the earth with aboue five hundred kindes of plants, and with as many beasts, it is very likely, that she exerciseth no fewer meanes vnder earth, wherby to enrich it. But as we haue proposed vnto our selues no other ende in all our discourses of heauen, of earth, and of the creatures therein contained; but onely to consider vpon the most worthy things therein, which might incite vs to an holy meditation of the providence of God, thereby the more to glorifie him: euen so will we doe in that which we now intend to declare, concerning mettals and precious stones.

What metall is, and of the kindes thereof.

Mettall is that which is pliable by the hammer, and hard, stones are hard, but not pliable; and waxe and mud are pliable, but no hard. Mettals are seven in number, (as the planets are. For gold representeth the Sunne; siluer, the Moone: amber called electrum, Mercurie, iron, Mars, lead, Saturne, brasse, Venus, and copper Iupiter: or else wee distinguish them in this sort. All metall is perfect, soft, and pure as gold: or, it is pure and hard, as siluer: or, it is hard and impure, as iron: or, it is soft and impure, as lead. And for amber it is compounded of gold, and siluer, as cyprus copper is made of brasse, and iron: containing an equall substance of brasse, and of iron: which causeth that iron too much concocted and high tincted, is easily changed into brasse, and rechanged againe into copper. But wee will now speake of gold, which is the most perfect and purest of all mettals. In very trueth nature neuer tooke delight to make a more perfect elementary substance then golde is: for it is as pure and neate in the qualitie thereof, as are the simple elements whereof it is composed. And therefore by good right doe we hold it in price of excellencie farre aboue all other riches, and doe esteeme it in our iudgement to bee much more precious then all other mettals. For beeing in the composition thereof proportioned in equall qualitie, sithly correspondent in the symmetry of the Elements which compound it, it is euen from the originall thereof so purified already, as are the simple elements: In such sort, that by their conjunction together in equall power, there is ingédred so delicate, & perfect a mixture of indissoluble vnion, composing an accord so faithfully, that there is made thereby an incorruptible paste, which is permanent to all eternity in the excellency and goodnesse thereof. Wherfore gold cannot be vanquished by iniurie of time, and of antiquitie, neither can containe in it selfe nor support any excrescence and superfluitie of rust. For though it bee put into the water, or fire, and there remaine for any long space of time, yet is it neuer stained, neither doth accept any other quality, but that which is naturall, nor yet doeth faile any whit: which is the particular priuiledge that it hath aboue other mettals. For they are all subiect to alteration, & therefore change and corrupt for a smal matter, and accept a good or bad quality in their original, or end. But gold is incorruptible, and therefore not subiect to such mutations: yea though it be drawne out in so small wire, that it be as fine as threds in a spiders web, and though it be buried in most piercing medicaments, as are sublimatum, and

and verdegreafe, falt, and vinegar, and that it remaine two thousand yeeres therein, it will not for all that bee corrupted, but contrariwise the more refined, but all gold hath not one selfe same perfection: for their mines and sources are different in goodnes. Sometimes also gold is counterfeit, sophisticate, and falsified through the infidelity or avarice of those, who mingle it, and multiply it with other mixtures of mettals of lesse value, and lesse pure then it is. But pure and refined gold is alwayes perfect by nature in al those qualities, which we have already touched, and it is found in diuers manners; to wit, mixed with sand, as in Bohemia: on the shore side amongst the waters neere to Gold bourgh, and Rife grond: and amongst the stones in mountaines as in Calcecut, and in the Indies. But the first generation thereof is at the top of mountaines, in the highest places, because that the sunne doth ther more easily purifie that, which retaineth too much earthines in it. And whē the raine and torrents doe flowe downe the mountaines, they carry the gold downe with them to the foote thereof, where it is gathered amongst the sand: or else in waters neere thereunto whether it is driven by violence of the floods: except perhaps the ground open with those raines, and the gold doeth there stick, as it oftentimes chanceth. And that, which is alwaies found in the entrance of the mine, is not the finest: but the farther you goe, the finer and purer it is, of better waight, and greater value. That then which is found in waters & rivers, is fished for and is in forme of little graines: and in rocks and mountaines it is taken out, by deluing and digging. And therefore there are holden to be three sorts of gold mines. For some are called pendent, some iacent, and others oblique and running. The pendent are those which are found in the superficies of mountaines, and haue the earth vnder them. They which are iacent or lie, are belowe in the field and plaine ground, carried thither by torrents and stormes of raine. And the other that are oblique, haue a crosse course whether it be in that which hangeth, or lieth, all whereof is driven by floods into the next riuers: for which cause there are riuers throughout all the world, the sand whereof seemeth to be of azure and gold, hauing indeede pure and fine graines of good gold. Now according as the mines are, so are there diuers means vsed to take out the mettall. For in those places which are dry, without water, they which are expert in the veine of mines, hauing true knowledge what may be in that place, doe cause it to be digged eight or tenne foote deepe, and as many foote long and broad: and as they proceede in their work, they still wash the earth that is digged vp, continuing so till such time as they finde the gold, which is sometimes so deepe, that they are driven to set vp arches of wood ouer them, that the earth may not ouerwhelme them. And when the mines are pendant along the mountaines, the difficulty is then more great, wherefore they also set vp engines to defend them from dangers, which are there very imminent. For some, to wit, those that dig into the rocke, are quite hidden therein, even as those that cut stone, are within a quarry; others creep scrambling vp the sharp rockes, with a basket at their backes, seeking out the earth of the mine to carry it to the water: others wash the same earth in a sieue, by meanes whereof the golde is separated, remaining in the sieue, after that the earth is runne out by little and little. Moreouer, out of these mines there issueth a stinking breath or damp, which doth oftentimes choake and kill them that worke therein, being not able to indure so bad an aire: some also are drowned by waters, which suddenly gush out of those places where they haue digged, when they thinke not of any such thing, quickly ouerwhelming them, before they can make signe to those that are aboue to helpe them. Againe, these miserable poore soules are oftentimes affrighted by euill spirits, who inhabite in great numbers in those hollow and solitary places, as many haue experimented to their great hurt. For sometimes it happeneth, that these diuels tumble great stones and whole rockes vpon them, throwe downe their engines, ouerturze their ladders, breake their cordage, and doe a thousand other mischiefes, whereby men are oftentimes slaine. Concerning riuers wherein the graines and sands of golde are found, the dangers are not so great therein, but the paine is no lesse. For if the riuers be little, the Indians vse to emptie and let it out till it be drie: and then take off the bottome thereof, and wash it, as aforesaid: and if the water bee very great, they turne it out of the channell, which done, they goe to gather the golde in the midst of the riuers, betwixt the stones and great pibbles, so that sometimes there commeth greater profite by this fishing, then by washing the digged earth, to separate the gold. But howsoever, yet is there great paines alwaies vsed to obtaine the riches of this mettall, so much coueted by men, and whereof the abuse is very great, as wee may in some sort touch, after that wee haue spoken of other mettals, which shall serue (A M A N A) for the subiect of your discourse.

How gold is found.

How gold is taken out of mines.

Of Siluer, Amber, Iron, Lead, Brasse, and Copper.

Chapter. 94.

A M A N A. THE most noble amongst mettals next to gold is siluer, for although that copper in colour, and lead in waight do neereſt approach vnto gold yet in tenuity of ſubſtance, in purenes and ſaltneſs, ſiluer is ſo like vnto it, that good ſiluer may be rightly ſaid to be imperfect gold in ſubſtance, failing in colour: and that by ſucceſſion of time it is ſometimes changed into gold: as in many yeeres ſpace lead turneth into ſiluer. The mines therof are more ordinary then gold mines. For France, Italy, Spaine, England, Germany, and many other regions of Europe doe beare ſiluer in diuers places, as well as the other parts of the world. And it is there engendred in ſower manners: to wit, eirher in the earth, which being gathered together, and then molten in the fire, doth yeeld ſiluer, or in lead, wherewith it is often found mingled, or in brasse, or in ſtones, out of which it is alſo extracted by fire. For in the mountaine called (Mons Regius) ſtones retaine very much ſiluer: which being alſo but into the fire, there is found in euery pound of ſiluer that runneth out of them, halfe an ounce of gold at leaſt. Siluer is alſo many times found to be mixed with copper, as in Alfaria neere to the Rhine, in the mountaines of Saint Anne, and in Meiſſen: for there are ſtones full of copper, in which is great abundance of ſiluer. And when it is ſeparated from lead, it leaueth a ſcumme, which we call (Lythargyrium) which is a kind of impure lead, retayning ſome vertue of ſiluer. For quick ſiluer, though it agree in name with ſiluer, yet it approacheth neerer to gold: for it is like vnto it in tenuity, & waight and to ſiluer in colour onely. But for all this it is no mettall, but a water condemat, not by heat (for it is not hardned) not by cold (for then it would be a ſtone or mettall) but by ſome other terreſtriall, rare and pure portion, whereby it commeth to be very waighty and cold ſpleadant and liquide, and is therefore rancked among thoſe metalline ſubſtances, which differ but little from water: and indeed the mountaines where quick ſiluer groweth are very greene, and full of fountaines.

Let vs ſpeake now of Amber, which wee haue put into the number of mettalles. Many authours doe diſagree very much in the diſcourſe of Amber. For ſome reckon that which is called (Electrum) amongst pliable and had metalline ſubſtances: others will not acknowledge it to be any other then a gumme of a tree, which is very much like to that of the Pine and Firre tree, producing Roſin, and is very common in Arabia the happy. Philemon writeth, that in two places of Scythia. Amber is digged out of the ground, like a kinde of ſtone, and in one place it is white, in another yealow. But omitting this argument, we will follow thoſe who make Amber a mettall, whoſe nature and property is in meane betwixt gold and ſiluer, and that ſuch is the true and naturall amber, as that, which we uſe in our beads is artificiall. And it partaketh more of gold then of ſiluer, becauſe it is more pure and perfect, and apt to be wrought. For if it did conſiſt more of ſiluer, it could not endure the forge and hammer. There are veſſels made thereof for beauty and profite: For good amber doth diſcouer poyſons in theſe two manners, by cracking and making the ſigne of an arch within. For when the rare humidity thereof commeth to be conſumed by the force of venime, it cracketh: & the colour changing, it ſeemeth that in ſtead of the great ſplendor thereof, there doth a kind of ſtaine repreſent it ſelfe like vnto an arch. Now that this kind of amber is very rare, it is not becauſe there is not enough to be had in mines: but auarice and ignorance of the vertue thereof cauſeth that the gold is extracted whereby it ceaſeth to be amber.

Concerning Iron; it is taken out of the earth, and to make it malleable, the maſſe thereof is (when it is taken vp) laid to dry in the ſunne, and that which is earthy doth ſofter in the raine, as that which is moiſt doth melt by the ſun, and the moiſt ſharpe part thereof, which is as the venime of it, is conſumed by the fire. The mines of this mettall are common in Europe, as in diuers parts of France, which are enriched by the forges that are there ſet vp, to bring this minerall ſubſtance to his perfection. Which by how much the more it is concocted and purged, by ſo much the more it is better in goodnes, in ſuch ſort, as that which is earthy, doth at laſt turne to ſcales & droſſe, and the moiſt ſubtile part thereof doth conuert into ſteele, after it hath bin well purged, & a little marble added thereto. And this is artificiall artificiall Steele. For there is in many places naturall Steele, namely in Persia very good, in the Chaldean Isle, and neere Damalcus, whereof the best cemiters in the world are made which cut so well, that there is no rasor bee it neuer so well Steele and tempered that hath a more fine and sharper edge. For this cause some say that there are some kindes of Steele and iron so excellent, that waight for waight they are esteemed of greater price then gold. Moreover men may see what art can doe in iron, when by much beating therof, and through the power of water, iron, be it neuer so thin, is made vnfrangible by blowes: because that such water, by meanes of fire doth consume the terrestriall and waterie excrement, which is found in this mettall. When then the iron is brought to be most pure, most hard, and most light, then is it most subtile, and therefore most strong, and resisteth best.

Lead consisteth in foure kindes. For there is blacke, common, and low-pricked lead: white, which is ordinarily called tinne. Bismutum which is of meane quality betwixt blacke and white, and is rare, & knowne but to few people though it be found in the mountaines of Bohemia: and the fourth kinde is compounded of Stibium. The ore of lead is molten, in furnaces prepared for that purpose, and being molten, it is let runne through pipes out of the furnace, whether the worke man wil. And whilest it remaineth very hot, they cast cleere water vpon it to make the forme arise: which waxeth very massiue, hard to breake, yealow and bright as glasse: and this is that which is called lichearge of lead. But this difference is betwixt white lead, and true tinne, that this doth alwaies grow with siluer, and the other doth grow of it selfe: in such sort that tinne is almost white lead blanchd by siluer. Brasse (as we haue already said) is made of a matter very neere approaching to that of iron: and so also is copper. But brasse hath the propertie, that it neuer rusteth, as iron and Steele doth: and therefore it will continue longer. In times past also, it was very vsuall to make armor and bucklers thereof, yea and launces likewise: witnes Homer, who recounteth that Melenas pursued Paris with a brassen launce. Flutes and pipes of organes, and other muscical instruments are commonly made of brasse: but it doth properly agree with trumpets, because it maketh a great noise in doricke musicke, and inflameth men to combat. That of Cyprus is harder, and better then any other. Some also because of copper make two kindes of brasse: to wit naturall, whereof the best hath spots of shining gold intermingled; & there is reported to haue beene found in new Spaine a peece of it of two hundred pound waight. Then is there artificiall brasse, which is called copper, or latten: and the most excellent is that, which in fower pounds of brasse doth containe one pound of white lead called tinne: also when the white lead is mixed to the eight part of brasse, then is the copper very good: but it is base being mixed with black lead. For the vse of copper, it is chiefly fit for faire instruments, as ordinance, cauldrons, and such like: wherein it is more excellent then brasse, because also it doth not give a bad tast, nor smell to such meate as is boiled therein. Thus haue wee summarily runne ouer that, which we thought most convenient to be spoken concerning mettals: we will now speake of pretious stones: whereof (ARAM) do you begin to entreate.

Of precious stones, and chiefly of the Diamond. Chapter 95.

ARAM. IF wee first say somewhat concerning the originall and matter of stones, the nature and vertue of them shall be so much the more easie for vs to comprehend. Now the originall of stones, as mettals, is in the earth: and they be all made of an elementarie substance, or of a pure and equall matter which is gathered together, or else is runne on an heape, or else hath beene purified in some sort howsoever. In which, heate doth chiefly operate. For that is it which boileth matter naturallie engendred to perfect the humour, whereof afterwards the minerall matter or stone doth consist. Theophrastus distinguishing all that which doth so grow within the earth, saith, that some things participate with the water, as gold, and siluer, and other mettals: some accord with the earth, as stones, yea precious stones, and all such earths as are in estimation because of their colours or of their fauours, or of some other properties. But if he would infer (as it seemeth) that all precious stones are terrestriall, if this opinion were true, then should there bee no precious stone bright and cleere, and yet almost all of them are so. Wherefore wee may rather say, that they are not earthie, but watry: that is to say, that they are composed of a certaine humour, which retaineth more of water then of earth: for it is a certaine kinde of clammy slime, wherein there is more water then earth, which being dried and thickned through continuance of the same operation, and by the vehemencie thereof, doth at last become a stone. Now that a grosse and clammy humour doth easily conuert into stone, wee see euident in all liuing creatures, and chiefly in our selues. For those stones and gravell, which breed in the bladder and in the reines, are ingendred of such humours, as in tract of time haue beene boyled and hardened by the naturall heat of our body. So then precious stones, which are bright and transparent, are not composed of earth, nor yet of water onely: but are ingendred of a pure and liquid humour, which retaineth in it selfe more of water then of earth. For in that these stones, being cast into water, sinke to the bottome, it is manifest, that they are not made of water onely, for then they should swim aloft like yce and baile.

Of the splendor and light in stones.

For the splendor and light of some, and obscuritie, or thickenesse of others: wee must first note, that the elements operating (as in all things else) in the generation of stones, they participate more with the water and with the earth, then with the fire and with the aire. And because that the earth is not transparent nor shining, as it is euident that the water is and cleere also, it followeth, that all the brightnesse and splendor of stones, doth proceede from the water. Therefore we say, that all cleere and transparent stones are ingendred of humours alike in cleerenesse and light: and contrariwise, that they which are troubled, obscure and thicke, do proceede from the earth: to wit, from a slimie and blacke humour that retaineth much earth, and but little water. And for so much as some stones are more cleere, and more shining then others, that proceedeth from the diuersitie of humours, whereof they haue bin engendred: for some humours are more cleere and more purified then others. Whereupon ensueth that some precious stones which are white, haue beene generated by an humour hauing the colour of water, which maketh them more cleere and more transparent then others: and so the variety which is in the colours of all stones, bee they greene, blew, red, purple, yealow, or of many mingled colours, one must iudge the humours whereof they did proceede at first to haue beene such: and that other precious stones which are not transparent proceed from troubled, blacke and obscure humours, for the water it selfe though it be neuer so cleere, doth become blacke, if it bee mixed with neuer so little blacknes. And such precious stones as are splendant, doe shine by reason of their great brightnes, which maketh their light continue and abound. As much must wee iudge of the cause of stains, spots, shadowings, cloudes, vaines and other vices, which are found in precious stones: and of the difference that is in their massiuenes, spunginesse, lightnesse, waight and hardnesse: for all these things proceede from the diuersitie of the nature and of the colours of such humours as haue engendred them.

Of the principall stones, and of their proper praises

Of the Diamond.

Now amongst precious stones, these beare away the prise, and are praised with especiall praise, the white diamond, for hardnesse, and soliditie: the greene emerauld for beawty, the red carbuncle, called the rubie, for lively colour, the skie coloured saphir, for grace, the yealow chrysolite for splendor, the diuers coloured opall, for varietie, and the cleere pearle for whitnesse, and roundnesse. First then let vs speake of the diamond. For as gold amongst mettals, so the diamond amongst stones is most precious. For the substance thereof is hard, and for that cause the more exquisite: as that is amongst mettals, which is the most pliable. By reason then of the hardnesse and soliditie thereof, the diamond beareth away the price amongst precious stones: for in colour it is inferiour to the emeraulde, to the rubie, and to the opall. But that which maketh it most to be esteemed, is, because that the filings, & small peeces thereof are precious: so that one scruple is sold for fixe crownes of gold: and because that by the hardnesse thereof, it cutteth all other stones, beeing not onely commodious in sculpture, but also very necessarie. Neither will it bee well cut or polished, but by the onely filings thereof, so hard it is. For which cause many haue written, that the point of a dart being rubbed with the powder of a diamond, it will easily pierce any armour: wherein this reason is apparant, that the Iron or Steele is heated by the blowe, whereupon it may be penetrated by the subtiltie and hardnesse of the Diamond. Which is also commended for this vertue, that being polished, it doeth greatly glister amongst precious stones: and for that it resisteth fire for the space of nine dayes time, without having any sense thereof, and afterwards it remaineth many other dayes, without being annoyed. Which sufficiently declareth, that this stone doth consist of most subtil parts: for otherwise it would haue pores and small holes, by which the fire entring, it should easily breake. The Diamond then retaineth a lively and strong splendor, in such sort that it doeth not onely shine, but doeth also sparkle, sparkle, and is besides that, vnchangeable, not beeing corrupted by iron, by moisture, by fire, by age, nor by vse. It hath also this propertie, that beeing tied to the flesh of the left arme, it doth hinder and withstand the feares of night. It is not then without good cause that this stone is so much esteemed by vs, and almost by all nations. For euen in the Indies, in Calicut, in Persia, in Tartaria, and other places, where rockes of Diamonds are commonly found, they are very deere and of great trafficke: so that they are transported into all places, how farre remote soeuer they be: witnesse the Isle of Carge, which lieth in the bosome of the Persian sea, where bargaines are vsually made for Diamond stone: it remaineth yet vn-cut from the rocke, although it be scarce within sixe hundred and threescore miles of that place where it is had. And therefore it is no great maruaile, if diamonds bee at so high a price as they are, considering that they are so much in request by every one: wherefore there are some found which are sold for twentie and thirtie thousand crownes a piece and aboue; for we our selues know, that there is one in the treasure of our kings which did cost seuentie thousand crownes. Wee are to note, that in the mountaine of Cugarquell, which is neere to the riuer of Goa in the East Indies, are the best and finest diamonds of all the world: as to the contrarie in the Isle of Canada, which neighboureth vpon Florida, there are found false ones, but so faire and well cut by nature, that the most subtil Lapidaries are very much troubled to discerne the one from the other: whereupon this Prouerbe did arise. Loe, theres a Canada diamond. But I haue said enough hereof. Now (ACHITOB) doe you speake of the nature and propertie of other precious stones.

and of the Amethyist. Chapter. 96.*

ACHITOB. THE Emeraud hath beene long time holden for the most precious stone of all other, as well because of the beautie thereof, as by reason of the many great properties which are naturall thereunto: in such sort as the price thereof did exceede that of the Diamond. But as the rarenesse of some things make them deere, so doeth the abundance of other things make them to bee lesse esteemed: As it came to passe, that the great quantitie of Emerauds, which not long since were found in the new found Countries of America, hath much abated their price, but not their beautie nor vertue, which euer remaineth, and is most excellent in those which are brought out of the East Indies: for they of Peru are of much lesse worth. The Greene Emeraud then is the fairest of all precious stones, but yet the most brittle. For it sometimes happeneth to breake euen in the act of coiture. Being drunke, it doth much resist poysons, by the nature of the softnes thereof: by reason that the abundance of the well concocted humour which is therein, doth refresh the spirit by the perspicuitie thereof: and so it is profitable to the nature of man, and resisteth the force of venime: and for so much as it is a stone it retaineth the vertue thereof stable. For wee may note, that all things which are pleasant to the sight, are profitable for man; whether it be in precious stones, or gold or silver, silke or purple: but aboue all, the Emeraud is faire, if that the art therein deceiue not the sight, for as well this stone, as others are oftentimes counterfeited and falsified in diuers manners. Moreouer, as the Emeraud is very soft, so is it very subiect to all casuall chaunces: for it is corrupted by fire and heate, and by the touch of other precious stones which are harder, chiefly of the Diamond, yea by every thing that can giue a blow. That which shineth most, and almost like the sunne, and which refresheth the sight, as forrests and Greene medowes doe, is most to be esteemed. But I beleeeue there was neuer any mention made of a more rich basin then that of an Emeraud, being one of the greatest treasures of Italie, which is in the city of Genoa, for it is reported that it was pawned in the necessitie of the commonwealth for foureteene hundred thousand ducats: thinke then but how much this Emeraud must be woorth. But that which is also said, that this is the same platter, wherein our Saviour Iesus Christ did eate the Paschal Lambe in his last Supper, maketh me to doubt much, whether there be any people that vpon one onely stone would lend so great a summe of money.

The red Carbuncle called the Ruby, is another precious stone, which is very beautifull, and hath the propertie to quicken the spirit, and make it ioyfull. Some authors haue made mention of three kinds of carbuncles, saying that there be some which shine in the darke; others also that shine, if water bee powred thereupon, and the third kinde is of those, whose cleerenesse is onely seene in another light, to wit by day time, or by candle light. Theophrastus saith, that there are some of the colour of water, some of the colour of the Amethyst, others of the colour of the Iacinth, and some of a red colour, which are called Rubies. In the Indies these stones are plentifully found: and Lewes de Barthema reporteth, that the king of Pegum, which is a citie in India, hath carbuncles called in Greeke Pyropi, of such magnitude and splendor, that if any one should see the king in a darke place, with these stones vpon him, he would seeme to shine like a cleere light, euen as if he were fired by the beames of the sunne.

Of the Saphir.

The Saphir doeth approach neere to the excellency of the diamond, in great hardnes: in fairenesse of colour, being of a skie colour, and in beawtie: and is very good for the sight if it bee not sophisticated. It refresheth a man, and being drunke is profitable for melancholy people, and for blowes and bitings of scorpions and serpents. Albertus Magnus affirmeth that he had twise found by experience, that the saphir would heale an anthrax, which is a kinde of bile. Which may be beleueed considering the medicinable vertue which is in this stone. For as thirst commeth through the biting of a certaine snake called Dispar, and as the hand is benumbed by the touching of a little fish, called Remora, so the venomous fire of the Anthrax may be extinguished by the long touching of the saphir: but it must needes be so big as it may couer the head of the bile.

Good reasons of the vertue of stones.

Having already made mention of the Iacinth, and of the amethist, to which there are great properties assigned, I will now touch some principall points in them. And first wee are to note, that the Iacinth is commonly of a yealow colour, but the best is redde, yet it is not so big as the other: being put into the fire it becommeth more obscure, and redder: and being out of the fire it shineth greatly. Also this kind of Iacinth doeth differ but little from the carbuncle in estimation of price. They that are of the colour of water are counted for base, and of no force. But Serapio hath writtē, that the good Iacinth keepeth men that beareth it out of the perill of thunder: and defendeth them from the plague, and prouoketh sleepe. Albertus Magnus likewise saith, that the Iacinth doth augment riches, and authority, and that it doth greatly comfort the heart, and cause much ioy. Now because these things might seeme to be paradoxes to many, wee will heare make a little discourse, following the precept of the philosopher, who thinketh it sufficient in hard and intricate questions, if we can well auoide and shunne absurd doctrine. For by this meanes many shall bee induced to esteeme more then they doe of precious stones, and to beleue the properties, which are attributed vnto them, if not as true, at least wise yet as possible. I say then that the Iacinth is of cold temperature: for that is almost common to all precious stones, and causeth them, especially the diamond, not to receiue fire very easily: for so much as the coldnesse doeth greatly helpe the soliditie and subtiltie thereof, which maketh that stones doe resist fire. Besides the Iacinth is good for the breath of man, either because of the likenesse of substance, or by cleerenes, or through some other mysticall cause, whereby repairing and confirming the breath and the spirit, it maketh man ioyfull: for sadness is nothing else but the contraction of breath, and shortnesse and difficultie of the same. By such reason then, as some haue saide that they haue experimented, that if any thing doe comfort the heart, it doth likewise resist the plague, which doth chiefly come through feare and imbecillitie of heart (as experience sheweth vs in regard of children, women, and fearefull people, who are soonertaken with this disease, then stout and hardy men:) the Iacinth abolishing these two things (feare and faintnes of heart) it may, I say helpe greatly to resist the plague. So also making the heart and the spirit ioyfull, and by that meanes more capable of good counsell, it shall be the easier for man to encrease in authoritie, and to augment in riches. For being defended from thunder, although that the Iacinth be (as we haue said) of cold temper, which causeth that it will not easily receiue endomagement by fire: yet do not we attribute to it therefore, that it will preserve a man from being hurt. But wee may rather say, that the spirit of his heart being reioyced by the vertue of this stone, may haue the grace to direct him into some place where he may be cleane out of the perill of thunder. Concerning the Amethist, it is also a precious stone and orientall, although it bee but of a low price in regard of others: in it is seene the colour and grace of wine, bearing a purple lustre: and it is thought to hinder drunkennesse if it be tyed to the nauell, and to stir vp dreames. Now

Of the Amethist.

(A SER) let vs heare you pursue our discourse of stones.

Of the Chrysolite, Topaze, Opall, Turkeſſe, and of the Agath. Chap. 97.

A S E R. V V Hoſeuer will neerely conſider vpon that, which hath beene written by the Ancients concerning the Chryſolite and Topaze, ſhall finde that that which we called a Chryſolite, was their Topaze, and contrariwiſe our Topaze was their Chryſolite. This ſtone is of yellow colour, not pure, but greeniſh, and is nothing inferiour to the Saphir in hardneſſe, if it be orientall. For you muſt note that the Germaine Chryſolite, and many other precious ſtones, which are found vnder the North, cold, Septentrionall Zone, are not ſo hard as the orientall; becauſe that there the heat is not ſo ſufficient that it may much attenuate the humour, which compoſeth the ſtone, and harden it: for the perfect concretion and gathering together is the cauſe of hardneſſe, which is done, when ſome very ſmall parts are mixed and conioyned together, as cometh to paſſe in the generation of euery ſtone. Moreouer the Chryſolite is ſeldome found, without ſome blacke ſpots wherewith it is ſoiled: and but for this, it is a very excellent precious ſtone. It is thought greatly to reſſeſſe luſt, if it be carried next to ones ſkin. Beſides, it is of great coldneſſe, whereby this argument is apparant, that being laide vpon the tongue of one that hath a feuer, it appeaſeth his thirſt. Plinie recordeth, that from an Iſle called Topazos, there was brought a Chryſolite to Queene Berenice, mother of king Ptolemy the ſecond, which was ſower cubites long: and that the king of Egypt did afterwards cauſe a ſtatue to be made thereof in the honor of the Queene Arsinoe his ſiſter and wife, which was placed in the gilded Temple, that this Prince cauſed to be erected,

The Topaze is of a greene colour, and ſofter then the Chryſolite, for it is eaſily brought into duſt with a file: in laſpe of time alſo it looſeth his ſplendor of it ſelfe, ſo that although it be very faire, yet none deſireth much to weare it. Cardanus affirmeth himſelfe to haue found that ſiſteene graines of this ſtone beeing drunke, make a ſingular remedy for melancholy perſons.

Now ſpeake we of the Opall, which for variety of colours is accounted amongſt the moſt precious ſtones. For in it is the fire of the Rubie, the purple of the Amethyſt, and the greene ſea of Emeraud, ſhine altogether by a maruellous kinde of mixture. There are ſome which haue a luſtre ſo mixed with all colours, that there can no more bee ſcene in a rich tablet nor more lively. Others ſeeme to ſparkle with violet flames, changing in manner of a fire made of brimſtone, or of a fire kindled with oyle. Plinie ſaith, that the Greekes did call the Opall Pederai, that is to ſay, paſtime for little children, becauſe of the great grace and beautie which this ſtone hath in it. For (ſaith he) firſt one would ſay that there were a green heauen in a pure chriſtall, mixed with a purple colour, and a golden luſtre, enclining to the colour of wine, which is alwaies the laſt colour that doth preſent it ſelfe. And yet one would ſay that this ſtone hath the head crowned with a purple chaplet, and that it is confuſedly tinged with all theſe foreſaide colours, and reſpectively with each of them. Moreouer, there is no ſtone more cleere then this: and ſome ſay that it is very good for the head, and comfortable to the ſight. Nonius a Senatour of Rome did ſo loue an Opall that he had, that hee choſe rather to be baniſhed out of Rome, then to giue it to Marcus Antonius, carrying nothing with him of all his wealth but the ring onely, wherein that ſtone was ſet. Opals are found in many places of Egypt, of Arabia, and of the Indies: but the beſt are brought from Zeila, an Iſle of Eaſt India, which produceth them as great as Walnuts. But we muſt note, that the Indians can counterfeit them ſo finely with ſimple glaſſe, that it is an hard matter to diſcerne the naturall, from falſe ones: yet their deceit is found in the Sunne. For holding betwixt the thumb and fore-finger a falſe Opall againſt the Sunne, all the diuerſitie of colours which ſeemed to be in this ſtone will turne into one: But the naturall Opall changeth luſtre euery minute, and ſpreadeth it heere and there, ſo that the diuerſitie of the colours thereof will ſhine vpon your fingers beeing holden (as is ſaide) and expoſed to the Sunne.

Shall we ſay nothing of the Turkeſſe which is garniſhed with the colour of heauen, and which hath admirable vertue? For it is of a ſkie colour and celeftiall blewe, and very bright: It is eſteemed, becauſe that in the night it likewiſe looketh greene: that part which is vpon on the earth is marked with veines: it is soft, and not of too cold a substance. Also lime slaked and laid vpon this stone, seemeth to bee blew, and receiveth the colour of a precious stone. It is commonly made bunching, and swelling out like an eye: and is found in this forme sowed and set a long the rockes in many places of the Indies: but the fairest Turkeses are in the kingdome of Rasigut. And because of the difficultie to come to those places where they grow, the inhabitants of the countrey beat them downe with staves, in such sort that they fall with their earth and mosse: and the people doe esteeme so much of them, that they account them as their greatest riches and delight, hanging them about their neckes in manner of Carcanets. It is no maruell then if these stones bee rare amongst vs: for we see no very common trafficke made of them, and yet they are much in request at this day. Their vertue and propertie according to the report of some, is very marvellous. For they say, that the Turkesse being worne in a ring doth keepe a man from hurt that falleth, yea though it be from his horse: and that it receiveth all the blow, and is oftentimes broken in pieces: which is lesse credible then that which some also affirme, that the vertue thereof doth resist poysons.

Of the agath

Now let vs speake of Agath, which is the biggest of all such as are called precious stones. But it is of so variable a kinde, that one can scarcely thinke it to bee one onely stone. For the Agath is white, red, yellow, ash coloured, Greene, blacke, changeable, blew: in briefe, the colours of all precious stones, and of all other besides do concur in it. And nature exerciseth so many fashions vpon it, that we may see it represent Forrests, fields, floods, flowers and trees. Histories haue celebrated verie much the Agath of king Pyrrhus, which represented the nine Muses, with Apollo in the middest of them playing vpon his harp, being all in sundry garments: in such sort, as it seemed that nature did contend with the painter to carrie away the price of such a representation. Cardanus reporteth that he had in his keeping two Agaths, in one of which, nature had painted the hemisphere of heauen, the distinct circles, with the round earth in the midst, enuironed by the waters: and in the other, an open gulf of the earth, seemed to breath out a fume that darkened the aire: wherein this was most admirable, that the colour of the smoake should seeme to differ from that of the aire, which was thereby darkened: this appearing white, and thicke, and the aire reddish, and somewhat cleere. But though the agath be noble and excellent for the varietie thereof, yet because it is but little bright, and shining, it is but seldome esteemed to bee of great value amongst precious stones. Some doe attribute this propertie thereto, to be good against stinging of scorpions: especially that Agath which is spotted with little graines of gold, which the Isles of Candie, and Sicilie doe produce. The same vertue is attributed to the agaths of India and to refresh the sight much, by but onely looking vpon them: and they say, that they staunch thirst being held neuer so short a while in ones mouth. But enough of this: now (AMANA) doe you looke to that, which resteth for vs to consider vpon, concerning these most precious stones that deserue to enrich our discourse.

Of Pearle, Corall, and Chrysell. Chapter 98.

Of pearle:

AMANA. IT is no maruell though pearles be so much sought after in these daies, by every one for ornaments, especially for women: for of old they haue beene in such or more request: so that while the Romane Empire flourished this was a common Prouerbe. That a woman could or might goe without pearles, as well as a Consul might goe without Officers: meaning thereby that pearles were an honor to women, and made way to be giuen them in the street, as the sergeants did for the Consul before whom they marched. Pearle is placed among precious stones, and is of great price, being esteemed for whitenesse, splendor and roundnes: and when it is found big, polished, and heauy, then may it be said to bee faire in all perfection. But there are very few pearles that haue all these beauties, and conditions. Concerning the generation thereof the ancient opinion hath euer beene, that the pearle was engendred in shels of fishes, wherewith the the Indian Sea doth abound, which engendring at one time of the yeare, doe open and gape in the night time, by that meanes filling themselves with dewe, whereby they conceiue pearles, which they make according to the qualitie of the dewe received: if it be cleere, they are cleere: if troubled, so are they troubled, and foule: if abundant, the pearles pearles are great: if scarce, they are little. Moreouer if it happen to thunder the shels shut together for feare that they haue; so that they haue no leasure to take in dewe enough, whereby they remaine lancke and empty, as if they had fasted: and thereof also pearles do proceed that are without substance, and full of wind.

But marke what our French Cosmographer saith: if these shels or oysters bane no o. Lib. 10, de cosm. c. 4. ther substance within them, but this pearle so conceived of dew how doth the race of this shell-fish maintaine it selfe? Moreouer in the west Indian seas, where abundance of these pearles are found, it cannot be seene how their generation may bee iudged by the cleera or obscure disposition of the weather, for if that were so, there is no doubt, but that all the pearles, which were found in one shell, should bee all of one manner: whereas the contrary is seene. that within one shell are found some darke pearles, others drawing to a tawny, some pale, some greenish, and some againe blewish, and very few there are, which haue the perfection required in a faire pearle.

Thereupon he concludeth, that this pearled fish maintaineth the kinde thereof by the egges which it breedeth: and that the pearles come out of the sand and grauell wherein they breede and are hidden: because that by little and little this grauell refineth it selfe, and groweth into these shels, or oysters; till such time as it hath attained to an entire and perfect forme, remaining still soft, for so long time as the oyster is within the water, but being out, it presently hardneth, and becommeth such pearle as we see. But without much disputing hereupon, euery man is of opinion, that these pearles are bredde in the shelles of fishes. And the experience hereof is not onely seene in the Indian sea, but also in the British seas, yea in all seas, and fresh waters: because that such oysters do swimme as well as fishes: of which there haue beene some fished vp in the river Garonne. But the industry of such as fish for them in the bottome of the sea is wonderfull: for from thence they fetch their best mother of pearle, Which lie within, and vpon rockes hidden in the waters.

They which are appointed to such fishing, enter into boates, and afterwards (leaving some within to gouerne them, and to helpe themselves also vp, when they haue done their fishing) they cast themselves into the water, diuing downe to the bottome, where they sometimes remaine for the space of halfe an hower, and with nettes catch these shelles: hauing taken some, they returne againe to the toppe of the water, and are receiued by those in the vessell, where refreshing themselves with meate, and drinke, and hauing fitted on that, which they put before their face, which is, as of little peeces of seare cloath very fine like a thinne bladder, made that they may see cleerely through within the water, they leape in fise, or sixe times a day. These oysters are also found fastned vpon rockes, which appeare aboue water, from whence they are fetched with paine, and beeing caught, the pearles are straight waies taken out, which otherwise would consume and lose their fresh colour: and in one shell there are sometimes thirty, or forty small and meane ones, but few great ones, to witte, one, or two. They were, doubtlesse, wonderfull faire, which were giuen to Ferdinand Magellano, in a certaine isle of the Moluccaes, which were fowre in number, each one of the bignes of a pigeons egge, esteemed to be worth fise and twenty thousand crownes a peece.

But this was a very small matter in comparison to the two vnions of Cleopatra Queene of Egypt, esteemed woorth fiftene hundred thousand crownes: one whereof shee dissolved in very strong vinegar, and drank it vp at a banquet, because it might be said, that shee had surpassed in sumptuousnesse of cost, the feast which Anthony had made her. Now for the vertues of pearles, they are very good for passions, and faintnesse of heart, and purge the blood, and beeing put into medicines, they take away clowdes, and dimmenesse from before the eyes, and dry vp the moisture that runnes from them.

Corall is likewise fished for in the sea, and put into the number of stones, although Of Corall. indeed it is a plant, or shrubbe, which being drawne out of the Mediterranean sea, and feeling the aire, doth waxe hard by the power thereof. And there is found, white, redde and blacke, in one selfesame plant, which groweth amongst stones and rocks in the bottome of the water: but the best coral is thered if it be euently congealed: for the white is not so massue nor heavy: but is light, rare, and full of holes like a sponge. When it is fished for, it is all couered with mosse, and hath no signe or apparition of rednesse. But beeing clenfed, it taketh colour, and appeereth fairely polished: now those graines of round corall, which are put in bracelets and collers, are not found so in the shrubbe: but it consisteth of many little branches, whereof these graines are made with a wheele, and files, and are afterwards polished with vermillion, and with a certaine earth which is brought from Tripoly in Africa. The properties which are attributed to Coral, are maruailous: for some say, that being hanged about the necke, or taken in drinke, it is good for them that haue the falling euill, for bloody fluxes, and loofenes of the belly, to fasten the teeth, to heale sores in the mouth: to prouoke sleepe in such as haue feuers, to diminish the spleene, for those that vomite and spie blood. Anicen placeth it amongst those medicines that comfort the heart, & Pliny saith that being burnt and pulverized, and so drunke with water, it is good for them that haue wringing in their belly, and the stone in the bladder. The ashes therof also are put into medicines for the eies: it thickeneth, refrigerateth, and doth incarnate hollow vlcers, and maketh skars smooth. But amongst other properties this is most admirable and true, that red Coral, which is pure and fulgent like the carbuncle, being tied about ones necke so that it touch the skin when that person is sicke, or shall be in short space after, or hath drunke any venom, which he yet feeleth not, the corall doth wax pale and lose the splendor thereof, which Cardanus hath often testified to haue prooued by experience.

Of Chryfall.

I will hereto adde some short discourse concerning Chryfall: because that as it is engendred in the veines of the earth, of the same humour that the Diamond is, which opened the entrance of this discourse concerning preous stones; so now this speech of Chryfall may shut it vp againe. Pliny and many others haue supposed that it was made of yce or snow, in a word, that it was water congealed through great cold. But it appeereth that chryfall is engendred of some very well purified humour, in that it is the cleereſt of all stones. Again, if the oldest yce in the world be put into an hot place, it doth presently melt, which chryfall doth not. Moreouer, it is most certaine that it is not found on the tops of mountaines, where there is continuall snow and extreame coldnes: but in quarries of marble & of other stones, yea and in mines of diuers mettals. This also is another reason, that yce doth alwaies swimme aboue water, but chryfall sinketh to the bottome. That chryſtal is best, which is white and cleere as water. It melteth with very great fire, & doth conuert into glasse, whereof there are very faire vessels made. In vertue it is restraining, and is therefore good for such as are sicke of Dysenterias to drinke, in good sharpe wine, after it is well and subtilly beaten to powder. The ancients made a bowle of chryfall, wherewith phisitions canterized those which feared the fire, and common searing iron: to doe which, they laide the same bowle directly toward the beames of the sunne: by the reuerberation whereof they did their surgery work vpon the grieued part. Now in this litle which we (cōpanions) haue declared concerning mettals and precious stones, we may imagine, that if there be sufficient matter to admire the effects of nature, ordained by the diuine prouidence, what might we thinke, if we should enterpriſe to speak of five hundred kindes of mettals, earths, and precious stones which the earth hideth within her bowels? But sith that we haue attained to the end of our discourse, which is to glorifie God in the knowledge and contemplation of his most noble creatures: let vs aduise our selues how to giue some good instructions vpon that which hath bene deliuered concerning minerals and stones hidden vnder ground, as (ARAM) you can declare vnto vs:

Of the instructions that men must take, in that gold and siluer are hidden vnder the ground, and of their vse and abuse, as also of precious stones. Chap. 99.

ARAM.

AS God declareth a great and maruellous prouidence in all his creatures (as we haue discoursed intreating vpon them) so also doth he manifest it vnto vs in the creation of mettals, and especially of gold and siluer, which are esteemed for the most precious. For we see how he hath hidden them in the most deepe places of the earth, and hath covered them with great and high mountaines: so that to dig & draw them out of their profound caues, men must therein lo trauell, as if they had enterpriſed to ouerturne and to transport these lofty hills from one place to another, and to search and pierce pierce through the earth from one side to another. For how is it searched by such as worke in mines? It is a maruell that they are not already come vnto the Antipodes, considering the deepe pits, gulfes and holes whereinto they are descended. Iob hauing spoken of golde and siluer, doth presently make mention of the bounds of darkenesse and shadow of death. Ioh. 12. And in very truth they are things which doe fitly agree with these two minerals: For they are hidden in very obscure and darke places, and couered with a very thicke shadow, yet cannot this limit the couetousnes and auarice of men, notwithstanding that God hath sufficiently admonished them to moderate themselues, seeing that he hath so hidden the gold and siluer, which prouoketh their auarice, making them so furious and insatiable. And therefore I might very well compare them to brute beaſts, yea to a flocke of sheepe. For although that they daily behold by many experiences, the calamities which fall vpon the world through auarice, and especially vpon those, which are entangled with this vice, yet cannot one take example by another, but doe all follow one by one like poore brute beaſts and sheepe, following one another when they are leade to the slaughter house, or when there is some one amongst them that hath lead the way to the rest, and hath made the first leape. For what daunger soeuer there bee, yea though it were to tumble headlong downwards, into some bottomelesse pit, it is sufficient if one begin the daunce for he shall presently haue good company; yea such, as there is not one of the whole troupe, but will lustily rush after without thinking vpon any daunger. Who doth not see that it is euen so in mans life? For according as some haue wickedly begonne, others pursue them, and the latter cannot discouer their owne follie by that of the former, nor yet correct it by so many examples as they haue of euill ends, and pernicious euent, which haue willingly fallen vpon the couetous. For this cause the Prophet hauing described the folly and presumption of men, which thinke to build an eternitie vnto themselues with temporall riches; hee addeth [Their way vttereth their foolishnesse, yet their posteritie delight in their talke: like sheepe they lie in the graue, death deuoureth them. See there the shepherd and the flocke of the couetous, death, and the sepulchre, Psal. 49.

Men compared to a flocke of sheepe.

Of the right vse of gold, and siluer.

Now our meaning is not here to blame the vse of golde and siluer: but onely the abuse. For we behold the great commodities that men haue by communicating one with another, and mutually aiding one another in all that which is rare and exquisite amongst them, and that by meanes of those mettals and mony that is coined thereof. For so may they furnish themselues of all things necessary for their vse, for their life, and according to their wish, not onely from one countrey to another, but (as wee may well say) from one end of the world to another. And if by their auarice they abuse not this great commoditie, it will bee much more profitable to all. But their vnſatiable couetousnesse of gaine is cause that the amiable communication, and the good desire of one neighbour to profit another, which should be by meanes of gold and siluer, is conuerted oftentimes into plaine robbery. For their hearts are so set on fire with loue of riches, that they propose no other determination vnto themselues, saue to heape vp treasures by a deceitfull meanes, which neuertheless they doe neuer enjoy in peace and content, beeing no more able to settle their couetousnesse, and asswage their appetite, then to quench a great fire with laying dry wood vpon it: but that it will alwaies encrease and enflame the more. And to speake truth, what is this gold and siluer but a little yealow and white earth? And if there be any difference, it is onely, in that the substance is more hardned: and what doe they differ therein from the basest and hard stones? It is onely in colour. Why then doe men trauaile and take great care to heape vp gold and siluer, rather then to heape vp dust, earth, and stones? But indeede this is much worse; for they heape vpon vnhappy treasure, when for earth and clay, they gaine vnto themselues the treasure of the curse of God. For it is written [Cursed be hee that heapeth vp that which is not his: how long will hee lade himselfe with thicke clay.] But what? This clay so yealow and white, firme and exquisite, doth dazzle their eyes more then any thing else: and yet for all that, it is but earth. And therefore it is but opinion that causeth one thing to be esteemed more then another. For if men had giuen that value to other mettals, which they haue appointed to gold and siluer, there would be almost no difference of the one from the other. I say moreover that if they had but equall regard to the vtility & nature of things, according to the profit which they receiue thereby, and the neede which they haue therof, they should more esteeme of iron, brasse and copper, then of gold & siluer: considering that by iron, the earth which nourisheth vs is plowed, & arts and occupations maintained, and that by it we defend our selues from the furie of beaſts and enemies: and of tinne and copper we make the most principall vtenfils and tooles in our houses to boyle our victuals in, and for other infinite vses. In all these things then wee acknowledge the folly and want of iudgement in men, who gouernethemselues more by opinion then by reason.

Of the vse, and abuse of precious stones

Exod. 25. 26.
27. 28.

Wee may say as much concerning precious stones, which they haue esteemed at a more high price then gold and siluer. For how many crownes doe they oftentimes giue for one pearle, or for a diamond, or for some other stone? If the fancie take them, and that they doe but onely like some small precious stone, then doe they spare gold, and siluer no more then if they were dust and clay: then that which they so much delight in, and for to obtaine which, they direct and gouerne their whole course of life; yea and put it into all confusion, is nothing with them in respect of a smalliewell. And what profit can redound vnto them by all this? Nothing else, but a vaine perswasion that induceth them to obtaine a stone of such and such woorth, as it pleaseth them to esteeme it at. If they would thinke as much of a flint, a flint would no lesse content them. If it bee for the beauty and colour that they so account of this merchandize: is there any thing fairer, cleerer, or cleaner then glasse? nay then christall? likewise the marble, alabaster, iasper, and such likematters, doe they giue much place in beauty or hardnesse, to the most excellent precious stones? If for their vertues and properties in phisicke they are so much respected, why then they should buy nothing more deere, nor esteeme of any thing more then of herbes and plants? I speake not this to despise or condemne the vse of precious stones, no more then of gold and siluer. For God did not create them, but for the seruice of man, and that hee might please himselfe with them, as with all his other creatures. For it was his will that his temple and the vessels therein, the garments of the high priest, and the seruice by him ordayned in the church of Israel, should be adorned and enriched with gold, siluer, and with precious stones. Againe, Dauid and Salomon, and the other kings of Israel were neuer reprehended nor condemned because they did abound in such riches. Wee doe not then condemne the vse, but the abuse. For God requireth that his creatures may be vsed according to his ordinance, and so moderated, that there be no excessse, whereby he may be dishonored and offended, or our neighbor endamaged. But it is an hard matter to heape vp great store of gold and siluer, and to dispend so much vpon precious stones, and other the pomps of the world, but that great wrong must needs be done to many persons, or at leastwise that the deeds of charitie, for which wee were borne, must needs waxe very slacke. Loe then, that which I haue thought worthy to instruct our selues in vpon our discourse this day concerning the riches hidde within the earth. And sith that wee haue in the twelue dayes of our meeting entreated of the principall parts of all this visible world, and of the creatures contained therein, let vs now, to conclude our discourse, draw all these parts into one body, to the ende that we may shew in this masse of the Vniuers, and propose as it were before our eies, the image of the greatnesse, puissance, and maiesty of God by the which men may in contemplation, and consideration of his workes, learne to feare, honor, and put their whole trust and confidence in him, as they ought: which (ACHITOR) let vs heare you discourse vpon.

Of the doctrine and profit which euery one must and may reape out of the totall workes of God in heauen and in earth, to acknowledge and glorifie him. Chap. 100

ACHITOR. IF wee doe well consider vpon those goodly matters, which we haue heretofore entreated of touching the creation of the world, and adorning thereof in euery part: wee shall without doubt feele our selues as it were lifted vp vpon an high scaffold, where wee may behold and contemplate God our creator in the excellent workes of his hands, and in the maruailous effects of his prouidence, in such sort as if all this visible Vniuers were a shop, wherein we doe see him worke before our eies; or else as if he were seated in a stately roiall palace, wherein wee behold him reigne vpon his celestiall throne ouer euery liuing soule: or as in a goodly temple wherein the glory of his Maiesty shineth on euery side, yea in euery creature, which is therein as an image, or mirrour to shew and manifest the creator and moderator of all things.

And indeed without this contemplation and knowledge for which wee are borne, and endued with reason, let vs not thinke but that brute beasts haue more whereof to bragge in regard of the world, and of the beautie and commoditie thereof, and that they receiue more rest, pleasure, and profit thereby then men. For they content themselves with that which they haue, and care not for that, which they cannot attaine vnto: enioying all that which is needefull for them, and that with pleasure, and without excesse, superfluitie, or any hurt. But men are to the contrarie, neuer content with their conditon, aspire euermore to that which they enioy not, and which they might well let passe: haue many times need of that, which is necessarie for them, and receiue no pleasure, but that which is mixed with some griefe and bitterness: neither yet can they content themselves, but that they must run into excesse to their great detriment.

This is that which hath enflamed vs with desire, in the progresse of our worke, to discourse vpon heauen and earth. And hauing brought our intention to a desired end: we will here represent (for the last point of our speech, as wee did in the begining thereof) all the parts of the world in one body, to declare in this great body of all the Vniuers, and to propose, as it were before our eyes the image of the greatnesse of the power, and of the Maiestie of God, and of his infinitenesse: to the end that we may all learne by the contemplation, and consideration of this Image, to honour him, and to put all our trust & confidence in him, as we ought to do. For this is the true doctrine, & the great profit, that every one must, and may reape by the grace of God, of this total worke in heauen, and in earth, to the end to acknowledge and to glorifie him. First, then wee are to consider, that not onely all that which we haue declared concerning the workes of God in this great Vniuers, but also all that, which the most learned euer could heretofore, or hereafter euer may comprehend and describe, is nothing else but as a very light demonstration of some draught of his worke, or of some corner of his magnificent pallace, or of some smalliewell of his inestimable treasures. For sith he hath created all these things, and that the heauen is his feat, and the earth his footstool (as I say speaketh) what may then bee the full perfection, height, and greatnes of himselfe? It is (as Iob saith) in the highnes of the heauen; it is deeper then hell: the measure thereof is longer then the earth, and broader then the sea. It is hee (saith I say againe) who hath measured the waters with his hand, and hath compassed the heauens with his palme, and hath comprehended the dust of the earth with three fingers, and hath poised the hanging of the mountaines. Thereby then wee must learne that God is infinite, and incomprehensible and so high, and so great that all this visible world is nothing in comparison to him, and that he doth containe, and confine, and surpasse it in every side, both aboue and below, before and behinde, on the right hand, and on the left. And that because we cannot comprehend, nor vnderstand what he is, the image of him was set before our eyes in the heauens, and in the earth, and as in a glasse to represent vnto our vnderstandings, him, whom we neither behold, nor know, except so far, as it pleaseth him to represent himselfe vnto vs in his workes.

Lastly, we must learne, that from the verie first howre of our entrance into this world, wee haue bene placed therein, as in the Temple of God to adore, and praise him therein. And in verie truth, whosoener shall consider of, and know God, as he hath manifested himselfe in the creation of the world, shall not hee haue good and iust occasion to feare, and stand in awe of him? For as we reade in the Booke of Iob, [If God cut off, and shut vp or gather together, who can turne him?] And straight [in his hand is the soule of every liuing thing, and the breath of all mankind.] On the other side, shall not wee bee induced to haue recourse vnto him, and to put our trust in him, as in the Almighty, who can saue and defend those, whom hee will take into his custodie, and whom hee will accept for his people, and for his seruants and children? Who so dwelleth in the secret of the most high (saith the Prophet) shall abide in the shadowe of the Almighty. I will say vnto the Lord, Oh mine hope and my fortresse: in my God will I trust: who will deliuer vs out of all trouble. And to conclude, we shall haue goodly matter, whereby to giue him glorie, and laude all the dayes of our life, by seruing him according to his holy will. Wee shall be I say, verie blinde and sencelesse, if wee doe not humble our selues vnder the greatnesse of the puissance of God: if we haue recourse vnto, or put our confidence in any other, but in him alone: and if wee doe not acknowledge his great providence, wisdom, and bountie, which hee hath vsed euer since the beginning towards vs, and the regard and care which hee hath daily had of vs, and how that hee entreateth vs so benignely, so tenderly, and with such fatherly affection, to the ende that wee may render thankes vnto him. For as wee haue seene, before that hee created man, hee would prepare his lodging for him: the which hee did adorne with all beautie, and with all riches, and did afterwards place him in this world, as in a most delectable palace, and made him Lord and Master over all his creatures, of whom hee hath provided him such abundance, and in such varietie, that it is impossible to comprehend these, or to desire more. As it were then rauished in the consideration of so great bountie and liberalitie of God, let vs crie out with the Prophet, [Oh Lord our God, how excellent is thy name in all the world! What is man that thou art mindfull of him, and the Sonne of man, that thou shewest him so much grace as to visite him, and to take care of him?] And so giuing glorie vnto his name, for so many benefits, and particularly for that it hath pleased him to graunt vs this grace, as to reduce to a desired ende our Academicall discourses, concerning his workes in the Vniuerse, let vs pronounce this goodly

ASER.

Doubt not, good friends, but you rememember as well as my selfe; that when God of his great mercie endowed vs with grace in our tender yeares, to publish and set forth in our Academie, that small portion of vnderstanding and knowledge which we had reaped out of the odoriferous vergiers of the morall Philosophy of ancient and wise men: touching the rules of lining well, by following the footsteps and traces of vertue. And that therein we so much preuailed (yea and more then we either hoped or expected) that not only our country men of France, but strangers also participated with vs of our labors, and fauoured and esteemed of them so well, that they spared not the paines and charges to translate them, and to make them speake in their owne languages: which moued and prouoked vs with gratification vnto them, to goe forward and to proceede further in our course. Whereby not long after, we manifested and made apparant the pursuite of our discourse, touching the Microcosmus or litle world, therein shewing and representing by a naturall history of man, the varieties and excellences of the body and of the soule, and specially the immortality thereof. And not content to trauell so farre as therein to reduce vnto memory, and manifestly to declare and set downe the wonderfull testimonies of God, and of his prouidence and iudgement, in the Anotamy and contemplation of the visibler parts & members of his chiefe work (Man) therby to conuince, and put to silence the Epicurian and the Atheist. We obliged our selues so far, (for knowledge alwaies ingendret a new and further desire to learne,) as at some other time (by the aide of God) to search and finde out the same things in the whole nature of this great visible world. And according to our desires, it pleased the diuine bounty, (who of his goodnes had giuen vs that commendable will and purpose) to perfect the same in vs, by his heauenly blessing. In such manner that we presently published and set forth, the third booke of our Academia intituled Microcosmus, or of heauen and earth. And not content therewith, aspiring higher then to the bounds and borders of the vniuersall world, we vowed to implore the supercelestiall fauour, that being better instructed and taught in the schole of eternal wisdom, and guided by his diuine light, we might also speake and discourse of the incomprehensible worke of God, touching the saluation of man, and so accomplishing our Academicall and Christian study, determined to rest from our labors. And to say the truth, what would it auaille or profit vs, to haue and attaine vnto the knowledge and vnderstanding of all humane and morall Philosophy, Logicke, Phisicke, Metaphisicke, and Mathematicks, to know what belongeth to ciuill and politicke gouernment, and to be brieft, not to bee ignorant of any thing, which the liberall arts and sciences teach vs, therewith to content the curious minds of men, & by that means to giue them a tast, & to make the enioy, some kind of transitory good in this life: and in the meantime to be altogether and wholly ignorant, or badly instructed, in the true and onely science of diuine Philosophy, whereat all the rest ought to aime, and whereof the finall end and purpose is, the true and permanent good of the soule? That onely, and none other, is it, which teacheth vs to know God, his paternall will towards mankind, and the rules of his law: that so we may liue holily heere on earth, and for euer happily in heauen. Therefore let vs boldly say, that without this spiritual wisdom, al learning & knowledge is meere vanity and folly: and serueth to no other end, (as the great Doctor of the Gentiles saith) then as it were visibly, shewing vnto vs, the inuisible things of God, to make vs so much the more vexed. Rom. i. 26. 27. sable at the day of iudgement, for not hauing glorified him as we ought to doe. Then seeing that we haue found the means, to pierce into the monuments of the Philosophers, to shew that men ought, & are created to liue vertuously heere on earth, & to read the naturall booke of Theologie therein as it were to find out & behold a shadow of the Deity, and to the glory thereof, are enabled by argument to reason of the being of all creatures, why should not we assay to open that great booke of the life of the lambe which taketh away Apoc. 21. 27. the sinnes of the world, therein to learne a more assured and perfecter lesson of the means how to liue hap John 1. 29. pily, & of the knowledge which we ought to haue of God & of his worke, to glorifie him for our saluation.

A M A N A. It was not without great reason, and good cause that Postel a learned man, in a letter written unto us, touching our discourse of Microcosmus, (the which is set downe and extant to be read in the last edition of our Academie, together with our answer thereunto) congratulating us in certen commendable termes, therewith mixeth a kind of harsh censure: saying, I am hartily glad and reioyce, having seene your writing and discourse of the naturall history of man, that you are so much obliged to the great king of heaven, that men may evidently see and behold the bright resplendant light of his divine gifts in the forme of your Dialogues, and thereby know the dignity of the holy language of Adam. Whereof your fained persons beare witness, and that in shewing the dignity of the name of your ancestors, surely named Primatu, you have intituled your work, not the Common wealth or Theology, but the Primatus which in that tongue is called Hacademiach, that is to say, sacred or divine Primat: but you must give me leave to tell you, as your true and perfect friend, that having omitted, and not spoken in some speciall Chapter, of the Church of God, (without the which there is no union) nor of the food and nourishment of the Spirit, sending to eternall life, without the which al is in vaine, you have wholly left out, or at the least too slightly let slip and overpast, both the one and the other formal & final causes, of that great workmanship of God, Man. Therefore my advise & counsel is (to the end that in your work, nothing may be omitted or found wanting,) that therein you would set down & manifest those most divine things, for that so accomplishing an Hacademich doctrine, as a most Christian thing, & an assured instruction of the truth, your writings may live for ever, to the honour and glory of the eternall God, and the profite of mankinde.

Our answer thereunto was grounded upon these two points: that in our writing, wherewe make a discourse of the workes of God, we have proceeded according to the measure and abilitie of our spirits, and of our youtnes: and that knowing, that the creation of all things, and the redemption of mankinde, are meanes to make us acknowledge the Deitie and our salvation: we had begun for our instructions, to set downe the being of all creatures, specially of man, that afterward wee might speake of his happy being in the familie of Iesus Christ, when with longer and profounder study, wee should have searched into and found out, the depth of the secrets which his holy word doth teach us.

To conclude, we are much beholding and obliged to the advice of Postel, and also to all those that have vouchsafed to honor and favour us so much, as to take the paines to read our books, yea and to our selves also, (as it is already shewed) for having past beyond our first bounds, & of Academick Philosophers, to become Christian Philosophers: untill that our Academie shall be a little Schoole of Theologie. That the enterprise is too difficult, and overhigh for us, we acknowledge it to be true, neither doe we affirme or boast that wee have attained to the full perfection thereof. But to approach neere to excellent things, is alwayes commendable.

A R A M. It is most certain, that the doctrine and examples of the writings and lives of auncient wise men, and famous Pagans, are of great force and efficacie in mens minds that are of generous education, to move and stirre them with great delight, to an inward desire of resembling them, not onely in the understanding of naturall things, but also in the practising of vertue. For that, man naturally desirous of present and immortal glory, perceiving and beholding after so long a time, and many ages, by antientique meanes and memories, ancient Philosophers, and ether famous persons, much honoured in their times, as it were to revive and live againe, hee is thereby stirred up and prouoked, to strive to make himselfe worthy of the like praise and commendation, by following and imitating their steps. But as it is a good, most commendable, and an excellent beginning, to proceed and goe forward in a Christian vocation: so to stoppe there and goe no further, is as much as still to be ignorant and miserable. How corrupt soever the nature of man is, yet it leaveth a certaine feeling in euerie particular mans conscience, whereby they are as it were constrained, not onely to apprehend a Deitie, but also to discern a difference between good and euil, and by that meanes are unexcusable, if they follow not and practise piety & vertue. And how much the more a man taketh paines, and endeavourith himselfe to discover & contemplate (by the reasonable parts and faculties of the soule) things intelligible and worthy commendation, so much the more he maketh himselfe more understanding, wise, and affected thereunto: to ioyne, frame and fashion himselfe to those things and actions, wherunto they resemble. For it is most certaine, and cannot be otherwise, that in the fall of man, there did rest some sparkes of those graces, and of the divine light, which he had received of his Creator; whereby he is still moved and prouoked, to enquire and seeke after the truth, and to desire to be unburthened, and freed from his owne proper and inherent corruption. But all these motions, both of the understanding and the will, are so weak and inveloped with so great obscuritie, and pernicious passions, that they cannot produce nor bring forth any cleare or perfect thing, no not so much as to make any show or apparance thereof, in any part of humane nature, without speciall all and divine grace, but onely a ruinous disfigured shew of the gifts and graces by him first received, specially, touching things which concerne the salvation or happinesse of the soule. For as S. Iohn saith, That the light shined in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not. And S. Paul, that the Gentiles walked in the vanitie of their understandings, having their thoughts obscured, and being strangers from the life of God, by their ignorance, and the blindnesse of their hearts. And because they became vaine in their imaginations, their foolish hearts being full of darknesse, they were destitute of understanding. This in effect is the true and proper iudgement which may be made if men, and of all their Philosophies, untill such time as being regenerated and illuminated by the spirit of God, they doe in Iesus Christ (the true Doctor of the soules of the faithfull) receive those gifts and graces which onely make them understanding and wise to salvation: which are most wisely and abundantly set downe and declared in the sacred Registers of the holy Scriptures. If then we will take the pains earnestly to trauell like good Christians, out of this heavenly treasure, to draw a sound and solid instruction having no other purpose nor intent, but onely for the glory of God, and to frame and bend our selues (and all those that will vouchsafe to heare vs) to his holy and blessed will, we doe no lesse doubt of his grace, and of the fauour and good will of men, then we haue already found and felt in our first workes.

Iohn 1.5.

That

A CHITOB. The name of a Christian is the most worthy name, that euer was giuen or attributed vnto man, infinitely surpassing all the glorie, that those ment thought to merite and deserve, who among the Pagans were called Philosophers, or wise men. For this title of Christian, signifieth and betokeneth him, who by the knowledge, grace, and doctrine of Iesus Christ (God and man) knoweth the true and only God (Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, cause, beginning, and end of all things) his iustice and his mercy; that enforceth and endeuoureth himselfe to be perfect, and repleat with holinesse, vertue, modestie, uprightness, constancie, and perseuerance; that with a certaine testimony of a good conscience, serueth God according to his will, and that of his meere grace and mercy confidently hopeth for eternall life and happiness: into the which most diuine knowledge and understanding, neither the Grecian Phylosopher, the Egyptian Priest, the French Druyde, the Indian Gymnosophist, the Romane Sibilla, nor the Magis of Persia, could euer penetrate: because they knewe not what that true Philosophy is, which teacheth and openeth vnto vs so many great and wonderfull mysteries, that is, (the Law of God) written by the Prophets, and (the Gospel) written by the Apostles. Which was the cause, that all those Pagans and Infidels, great personages, and men deeply learned and studious in diuers Arts, for the most part having a secret feeling of the felicitie of man, touching the tranquillitie of his soule, and taking great paines and much labour to attaine thereunto, and to teach and instruct others therein, were ignorant, and knew not the true and assured meanes how to enioy the same, neither yet could find out the originall fountaine from whence the same proceeded. That is the loue, mercie, and charitie of God towards mankind, redeemed by the blood of his Sonne Iesus Christ, and purged from all his finnes. Therefore, notwithstanding that the lines of diuers Philosophers, and others their Schollers and disciples, was learned and peaceable in some sort, and also cleared and freed from diuers vices and corruptions. incident to the common sort of men, yet it resteth and consisteth in vs (if we be true Christians) without comparison, to line more understandingly, more happily, more contentedly, with more ioy and peace of conscience, and better purged from all impediments and vices then euer they did. To that end we haue many notable lessons, and a most certaine doctrine of the Registers of the holy Spirit (the Canonickall Scriptures) Then let vs boldly peruse and turne ouer those sacred Rowles: from thence first to draw out certaine simple draughts, or small proofs of Christian Philosophy; and if wee proceede so well and happily, that in the studie of his diuine wisdom wee finde in our soules and consciences an increase of spirituall graces, whereby wee may bee bold (& what should we feare to undertake in searching for, and setting forth the glory of God?) to speak of the high mysteries of Religion, wee will endeavour our selues in our Academie, to bring to open view, and to set forth a greater matter of Theologie.

In this booke therefore our intent and purpose shall be; first, onely and generally to frame and fashion the affections of the Soule to the loue of pietie, and to shew and set forth the meanes how man should walke in holinesse and uprightnesse of life and conuersation. Secondly, to represent vnto him Spirituall Meditations, which make a compleate happy life. In the first part of this Philosophie, wee will shew, how a Christian Philosopher before all other things, ought to purge and cleanse himselfe, of seuen principall follies, which commonly doe as it were pursue and follow man, that is, how to know the Deitie as he ought to doe: not to esteeme of man more then of God; not to thinke that he shall line alwaies in this world: to know why, and to what ende he lineth here on earth: not to iudge the happy or unhappy state of man by exterior signes: not to beleue or giue credit to his enemies more then to his true and faithfull friends: and lastly, not to perswade with himselfe, or to presume that hee is wise. Consequently, wee will declare and teach him to consider of, seuen other singular things, requisite, and altogether necessarie and pertinent to a happy and godly life: that is, The Church, the Word of God, the Sacraments, Praier, reading of the holy Scriptures, Charitie, and Almes. Thirdly, wee will produce and declare, how a man ought to haue a great and speciall care, to cleanse and keepe his soule and conscience, cleane, unspotted, and undefiled from seuen deadly and pernicious vices, that is, Covetousnesse,

Ambition,

The subject of the discourse in this booke.

Ambition, excesse of Apparell and meates, Pleasures unlawfull exercises, Envy, and Slander. Fourthly, we will touch and point at seven principall vocations, wherein all men are bound and obliged, to shew forth and make knowne the fruits and effects of all this Christian Philosophie, to the glory of God, and for the good and benefit of mankind; which vocations are, to be married, to be a Father or a Mother, to be a Childe, to be a Magistrate, to be a Subject, to be a Pastor, to be a flocke. Fifthly, we will speake of seven considerate reasons and arguments to moove and induce all Christians with great affection to embrace the meanes of a happy and godly life, set downe and declared in this Philosophie: which are, the authoritie of Iesus Christ, his Names, Holy, and Emmanuel, five other titles belonging vnto him, his two names (Iesus Christ) that wee are all Strangers and Pilgrimes in this world: and to remember that the Kingdome of heauen is at hand. Not that wee will stretch the doctrine of so many notable points and matters so farre, as to take vpon vs seriously and fully to entreate of them, in all their seuerall parts (for then we should be forced to make and compile many large volumes thereof) onely wee will content our selues, to set downe certaine brieve Summaries and generall points, wherunto euery true Christian ought to bend all his thoughts, words, and workes: speaking neuerthelesse, of all these things in such manner, that sufficiently, and by a certaine order, euery man shall be led, and addressed by the word of God, to the knowledge of godlinesse and Iustice, and to a true manner of life, well ordered and governed in alle states and conditions.

Touching the second part, which shall properly belong to a contemplatiue life, it shall consist of seven principall points, that is, Meditation of future happinesse: Knowledge of the meanes that assure and warrant this beatitude vnto Christians: The certaine way how to apply the signes and markes thereof vnto themselves: an assurance that they shall neuer fall from God: how they must be constant in afflictions: to perseuer in their vocation without feare or fainting: and lastly to meditate and pray continually.

To conclude, we haue specially chosen the number of seven, therein to comprehend and bound the diuersitie of all our discourse, because the number is anciently and long since knowne to be full, perfect, vniuersall, and sufficient, to represent all things in perfection: and for that cause is oftentimes set downe and rehearsed in the holy Scriptures. Wherefore we hope, that all those that shall and will accompany vs in our vovves, by reading, vnderstanding, and practising of that which we shall set downe, both in the one and the other part of this our Philosophie, shall and may assuredly line with vs, not onely Christian Philosophers, in name, but also in deed and in effect: and as it becommeth the true children of our Father which is in heauen, and that desire by the way and means which his Sonne teacheth and sheweth vnto vs, to enter into his kingdome. God grant vs all the grace so to do.

If I pray vnto God he will aide me.

The

THE CHRISTIAN PHY- LOSOPHIE OF THE French ACADEMIE.

Of the true and onely meanes to obtaine eternall life.

What is it to be a Christian Philosopher, and how such a man ought specially to purge and cleanse his soule and conscience of seven principall follies, thereby to enjoy and attaine unto a happy, peaceable, and contented life. Chap. I.

Two kindes of men that are altogether carelesse, or little respect the difference that should be betweene them.

IT was not without great reason, that Pythagoras the Philosopher, faining to himselfe a generall view of all mankind, in a contemplative speculation, behelde them comming into the world, as into a Faire, or common Market place, and diuided them into three parts: giuing to the first, for the ende, finall purpose, and intent of their thoughts, imaginations, and actions, glory and ambition: To the second, couetousnesse: And the third, as the most noble, he sequestred, and set them apart from the common traine of all other men, to apply themselves and their whole studies to the meditation of celestiall things. And in trueth this Pagan Philosopher did not varie much from that which diuine wildome teacheth vs, when in her sacred Registers, shee maketh two sorts of men, calling one the children of God, the other the children of the deuil: and maketh a notable difference betweene them, not onely in this life, but also in regard of that which is to come. In this life, because the first apply and giue their minds to meditate and thinke vpon that which concerneth the kingdome of their Father which is in heauen: and the dignitie and excellencie of their vocation, to walke therein holily and vprightly. And the others meereley thinke vpon nothing else, but the world and worldly vanities, and how to follow the lustes and concupiscences of the flesh. In the world to come, because the latter shall bee accursed and damned for euer, the others eternally bleisfed and happie for euer.

And in truth, euery man may easily conceiue and know, (if he be not altogether deprived and destitute of that which maketh him to bee discerned, and different from a brute beast) that there is good and euill, vertue and vice, wicked and godly men: That God altogether good, altogether iust, and altogether puissant, cannot but loue the good and hate the euill, and will giue vnto the good the reward of goodnesse, (which is the good it selfe) and to the wicked the reward of euill, (which is the euill it selfe.) And that by good consequence, there is great difference betweene the way to heauen, wherein consisteth the true and soueraigne good, and the way to hell, which is eternall damnation, betweene the pathes to heavenly light, and the way to eternall darkenesse:

betweene the affections and the works of the children of God, and likewise of their ends, and the affections, workes, and ends of the children of the diuell. Yet it is very true and certaine, that diuers men are so brutish and beastly, that they doe not once thinke vpon, nor consider these differences, neither in regard of this present life, nor of that which concerneth the life to come. Somelightly esteeming and thinking thereon, seeke not to bee sufficiently instructed and informed therein, that they may know it as they ought to doe: others vnderstanding the same in such manner, that they are able to teach and instruct the ignorant, are so blinded with the splendor and glory of terrestriall things, and so powerfully drawne, and carried away by the affections and lusts of the flesh, that they vtterly omitte, leaue, and forget all good motions for such vanities. And even among the children of God, living in this corrupt world, wee see and finde few that shew as they ought, and could doe, in what, and wherein they differ from vaine and worldly men. So much is the whole masse of mortal men inclined (by the hereditarie vice and sinne of Adam) to liue after the lusts of the world, the flesh and the diuell.

2. The summarie effect of true wisdom, which maketh a man a Christian Phylosopher.

This naturall corruption, and the necessitie that all men haue to propound vnto themselves, a course and meanes to withdraw their mindes from vice, to liue holyly and happily, was not altogether vnknowne to the Phylosophers. Socrates and Plato, esteemed to bee the wisest among them, and all the Academicks, that euer approached to the knowledge of the truth of things, taught, and affirmed, the blisse of the soule to bee the onely end and soueraigne good of man, shewing that the meanes to attaine this blisse, is moral and contemplatiue vertue, the true effect and substance of Philosophie. For (say they) this Science causeth and stirreth vp two effects in the soule of man, the one by purging it of false opinions, and vicious passions, the other by making it turne, by true reasons and arguments from the contemplation of sensible and terrestriall formes, to intelligible and celestiall things, and thereby to the Idea or substance of goodnesse, which is God. And in such discourses those ignorant Pagans, wanted not diuers notable perswasions, and learned precepts, to moue them to frame their liues to liue honestly and vprightly: but in the best, and soundest arguments and reasons by them alledged, touching the Deitie, and the blessednesse of the Soule, there was so much inconstancie and vncertaintie to bee found and perceiued, that it is easie to be iudged, that they had only confused imaginations touching the knowledge of God, and the soueraigne good of man, and therefore could not bring them to the true vnderstanding of heauenly wisdom: so farre off they were from attaining thereunto. And to say the truth, those little sparkes of light, resting and remaining in humane nature, which cause the eyes of the Soule, sometimes to looke vp, and to behold and thinke vpon diuine and heauenly things, are like vnto a flash of lightning, (when it thundreth) vnto those that by night walke in the fields, because for a little while, and as long as that flash and sodaine light lasteth, they see a great way about them; but it serueth not their turnes to conduct them in the right way, which they desire to holde: for at the same instant againe, they see lesse then they did before. Therefore it is requisite and necessary, that another greater and stronger light, then the sparkes that shine in our nature, should interpose it selfe to guide vs through the darknes of this world, to the true end and intent of our life, which is to know God, and his paternall will towards vs: and how we must liue according to his commandements, thereby to attaine, and finally obtaine, eternall life. For in these three points consisteth our soueraigne good, and he that vnderstandeth them well, and knoweth how to put them in practise, is the child of God, and a true Christian Phylosopher.

3. The ground of Christian Philosophie: To amend our liues.

This light so necessarie for a Christian, and without which, all other lights shine in vaine, is the same light which illuminateth all mankind comming into the world (as the holy Scriptures saith) and which was from the beginning, creating, and making all things, although the world knew it not, that is, the word of God made flesh, the true and eternall light, which casteth and spreadeth his beames perpetually and generally ouer all creatures: but this remaineth singularly, specially, and properly in the children of Adam, that they are endued

dued with reason and vnderstanding, and haue the knowledge of good and euill, ingrauen and engrafted in their consciences. Yet there is no man (how foolish soeuer he bee) that hath not some effect and sparkes of this light of life. But this common grace of illumination, is not enough, nor sufficient for any man whatsoever, to penetrate into the kingdome of God, to contemplate and behold his glory, to vnderstand and know his will, and obediently by faith, to enioy and possesse the true peace of conscience. For it is the onely spirit of the same word of God (Iesus Christ) which openeth that gate of heauen: to those onely, that haue receiued and acknowledged him for their Sauour. To whom Iohn 1.12.
*and which are not borne of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. As the same holy Spirit also presenteth vnto them the bright shining light of the Gospell, thereby to enter into the gate of the kingdome of heauen, shewing and teaching them, how they ought to frame their actions to the law of life, and thereby obtaine euerlasting saluation. With all the which treasures of soueraigne and heavenly wisdom, we haue the meanes, not onely to enrich our selues, by reading, vnderstanding, and practising of the holy Scriptures in generall; but also, by many brieve sentences, which therein are particularly set downe, and propounded vnto vs. As singularly and specially we are to meditate, and carefully to thinke vpon the words of our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ, after Saint Iohn Baptist had admonished the Iewes, saying, Amend your liues, for the kingdome of heauen, or of God, is at hand. For it is most certaine, and infallible true, that the holy Spirit rehearsing and reciting those few words, first therein comprehended all that, which the forerunner of Iesus Christ preached, both concerning the Baptisme of Repentance, by the remission of sinnes, as also of the kindome of God in his elect, by his mercy; and in the reprobate, by his iustice: comprehending therein also, the whole summe and effect of the first preaching of our Lord Iesus Christ, concerning the things foreshewed by the Prophets, touching the kingdome of heauen, and the redemption of man, by the same Iesus Christ. Wherefore, if like children of the light and true Christians, we can, and are able wisely and sufficiently to meditate and thinke vpon, that which is said vnto vs in this brieve and short instruction. First, we shall finde in this onely word, (to amend) a full and perfect knowledge of all holy and heauenly doctrine: and then proceeding further, to the vnderstanding of the reason added therunto, which is, (That the kingdome of God is neere vnto vs, or at hand). We shall vnderstand and know, what our hope of celestiall inheritance is, whereunto wee are called and invited by Iesus Christ. In such manner, that framing and fashioning our liues according to these two diuine conclusions, wee shall to our great comforts and consolations, obtaine a certaine testimonie, in our consciences, of the difference which wee sayde before to bee betwene the children of God, and the children of the deuill, not onely in this life, but also in the life to come. Let this then bee the true foundation of our Philosophie, to hold for certaine, that the thing which wee must before all things learne, like true Christians: and that which wee must alwaies specially haue in our hearts and thoughts: and aboue all things practise and effect, is the first exhortation of our great Master, and Lawgiuer Iesus Christ, Amend your liues. And therefore let vs marke and specially consider, that the holy Euangelistes heere vse a word, which in the Greeke tongue signifieth vnderstanding, or aduise and wisdom, after that a man hath acknowledged his error, his corruption and his folly. Whereby wee are to learne, that the amendment which Christ calleth vs vnto, consisteth herein, that hauing bene so improvident, and euill furnished of vnderstanding, and true iudgement, and so foolish and euill aduised, as to follow the concupiscences, conceptions, and desires of our naturall corruption: and by that meanes not to knowe the true God, and his righteousness, as wee ought to doe: wee should in time to come, haue that vnderstanding, intent, and remembrance, both in our hearts, and in our actions, to beleue in the Deitie, and to goe on forward and proceed in our course of life, with feare and obedience. Heereunto wee must adde, that which God saith by his Prophet, My people is foolish, they haue not knowne mee, they are foolish children, and haue no understanding, they are wise to doe euill, but to doe well they haue no knowledge. And that which Moses hath written in these words, They haue corrupted themselves towards him, by their vice, not being his children, but a froward and crooked generation, doe you so reuerd the Lord, Oh foolish people and vnwise? And that also which Salomon excellently Pro. 1.20, &c. saith, *Wisdom cryeth out and saith, Oh you fooles, how long will you loue foolishnesse?

and the scornfull take their pleasure in scorning? and the fooles bate knowledge? learne you at my correction. To the same purpose also, Saint Paul making a most notable comparison between the state of humane nature, before Spirituall Regeneration, and the grace of God in Iesus Christ, in the renewing of the faithfull by his Spirit, saith thus: For we our selves also were in time past, unwise, disobedient, deceived, serving our lusts, and diuers pleasures, lining in maliciousnesse and enuie, hatefull, and hating one another. By all these places, and the like abundantly to bee found, in that great volumne of the sacred Bookes, by vs called (the Bible) wee gather, (as out of the first word aforesaid of Christs preaching) two points: first that it is a horrible, and most great folly, not to know God and his kingdome, and to liue according to the pleasures of the world, and of the flesh, in sinne and wickednesse: secondly, that man is naturally inclined and carried by his owne corruptions, to that extreame folly, to bee ignorant of God, and to plunge himselfe headlong into vice: for otherwise the holy Ghost would not so often admonish and counsell him, and that with such vehemencie and infallible reasons to leaue and abandon his so great blindness and corruption. Which the better to make vs know and vnderstand, The Diuine voice oftentimes pronounceth, the amendment of life, which Christ asketh and requireth at our handes, by a conuersion and returning vnto God. Ob Israel (saith the Lord by Ieremie) If thou returne, returne vnto mee. And by Ezechiel, I desire not the death of the wicked, but rather that the wicked should turne from his waies, and liue. Again, I have heard Ephraim complaine thus, thou hast corrected mee, and I was chastised, as an untamed calfe, conuert thou mee, and I shall bee conuerted, for thou art the Lord my God. And Saint Peter also said, Amend your liues therefore, and turne. And Saint Paul, I first shewed vnto them of Damascus, and at Ierusalem, and throughout all the coastes of Iudea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turne vnto God, and doe workes worthy of amendment of life. For this manner of speaking, so often vsed in the holy Scriptures, evidently, and plainely sheweth vnto vs, that the life of man resembleth a voyage, and that whosoever hee bee that offendeth God, walking in this world, according to the lusts of the flesh, turneth his backe to God, to heaven, and to life eternall, and goeth headlong to the Diuell, to Death, and to Hell: and that to the contrary, to conuert and turne to the Lord, by amendment of life, is to turne his backe to Death, to Hell, and to the Diuell, to goe to God, to drawe neere vnto him, and to obtaine heaven, and life eternall.

4. Seuen principall follies, which a Christian Philosopher must shunne, and specially avoide.

To the end that we may begin to build vpon the foundation of our Philosophy, & reap some profite by the grace of our Lord I E S U S C H R I S T, which calleth the blinde and fooles to the light of his Gospel, that they may repent and amend their liues, wee must learne and vnderstand how, and which way, we ought to conuert and turne vnto God, and approach neere vnto him that is most holy; not by changing of place, because God is in every place, but in life and conuersation: that wee may bee holy, and conformable to Christ, as in him wee are reconciled to God our Father. For (as Saint Augustine saith verie well) As wee are like or vnlike to our Lord Iesus Christ (man with man) so wee approach neere, or draw backe from him, (God with God.) Now as all Sciences haue certaine Rules, Principles, and Purposes of honestie, and vprightnesse, from whence their doctrines and instructions are drawne, thereon to ground all vertuous actions, in like sort, the holy Scriptures haue a much better, and a more certaine manner and meanes, then any other can haue, to direct, leade, and guide vs, to the true end and intent of our life here on earth: for although that men (as they are naturally vaine and full of ambition) doe alwayes affect a notable apparance or outward glosse, to set a faire shewe, by exquisite and Rhetorician termes: vpon the order and disposition of their writings, thereby the better to set foorth and signifie the sharpenesse, and subtiltie of their wits and vnderstandings, by that meanes to win and procure some credit, to their doctrine & precepts. And that to the contrary, the holy Ghost, speaking by the Prophets and Apostles, alwaies taught, and instructed vs, plainely & without pride, and in all places generally doth not strickly obserue, a certaine order and methode. Neuerthelesse, it is most true, that wee may obserue in the methode of

of that great Docter of our soules, two generall points, which without comparifon, are of greater waight and efficacy, then all that which the greatest Philosophers in the world, could euer write or fet forth: the one, to imprint in our hearts the loue of God, and of his righteousnes, from the which naturally, we are fallen: The other, to giue vs a certaine rule of the diuine will of God, which suffereth vs not to wander and wauer here and there in the ordering of our liues. Grounding vpon this method, we are perswaded, that to set forth the true and onely meanes of a happy and blessed life, it is requisite for vs in the first place, to produce seuen principall points of our ignorance and folly, which neuerthelesse are many more. But because the number of seuen (as it is already sayd) commonly signifieth perfection, it shall suffice also in our Philosophy, to shew that man is wholly Ignorant and foolish, vntill such time, as that changing of opinion, by celestiall grace, he becometh wise, and vnderstanding, touching the principall points of his vocation, and so repenting, turneth vnto God, and withdraweth his minde and cogitations from wickednes. These follies are: (Not to beleue in the deity. To esteeme man more then God. To thinke to liue euer in this world. Not to know why he liueth here on earth. To iudge the happy or unhappie estate of man by exterior things. To beleue & credit our enemies, more then our friend. And to thinke our selues wise.) For these seuen follies are like to the cables of vanitie, and the cords of iniquity, wherof Esay speaketh, when hee pronounceth malediction vpon those, that draw iniquity with cordes of vanity, and sinne as with cartropes, which say Let him make speede, let him hasten his workes, that we may see it, and let the counsell of the holy one of Israel draw neere, that we may know it: which put darknes for light, and light for darkenes, that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for sowre, which are wise in their owne eyes, and prudent in their owne conceits. Opinions altogether false, and peruerse impressions, whereby the diuell bereauing man of the feeling of sinne, and the apprehension of God, drawes him, as it were, with cordes and cables, into all iniquity, and consequently into the bottomlesse pitte of hell. Whereof the Prophet specially setteth downe three examples; the first, of prophane people, such as mocke God, and beleue not in him; the second, of those that couer and disguise euill, with the name of good, and darkenesse with the vaile of light. The third, of those that presume of their owne sufficiency and wisdom. Therefore this deduction of the seuen follies, or vices aforesaid, will agree very well, with the doctrine of Esay, when wee shall shew and prooue, that they tend onely to perswade man, that hee is a beast, ignorant of good and euill, expecting neither the one nor the other after hee is dead, thereby to make him altogether, to repose and stay all his thoughts and cogitations, vpon this transitorie life, to plunge himselfe headlong into the delights of this world, and to liue wholly without the feare of God. Which being things vnworthy of the name and profession of Christian Philosophers, let vs see, and assay, how wee may teach and instruct them, to learne to renounce, and forsake all these follies, and thereby become wiser in time to come.

Egay. 5. 8, &c.

That a man must, and ought to correct this first, and most extreame folly in himselfe, which is, not to beleue that there is a God.

Chapter 2.

1. The feeling of a Deitie, printed and ingrauen in euery mans heart: denied and rejected by many, rather monsters then men.

IT is a thing confessed & granted by all men, and in all ages, that there is nothing so naturall, nor so vniuersall, nothing so generally, constantly & perpetually received and auouched by men, then the feeling, beleefe & apprehension of a Deitie, the first, soueraigne, and most powerfull cause of all things that are, that liue, that haue feeling and vnderstanding: This feeling belongeth only vnto man, the lively image of God. It being that which properly & generally separateth, and setteth him a part from al other creatures. In all other things (as laughing, speaking, reasoning, iudgement, memory & wisdom) beasts are esteemed inferior vnto man, as hauing no part therein. And there are many so weak & ignorant touching the faculties of nature, that men may well say, that therein they doe in a manner little differ from broit beasts : which mouued an ancient Father to say, that man oftentimes differeth more from man, then man from a beast. And certainly, if there bee any cleere and euident testimonies to prooue it, it is specially herein, that although the soule of man wholly vnlearned, hath inwardly ingrauen in his heart and minde, and as it were, mixed with the marrow in his bones, that there is a God : Neuerthelesse, diuers men (or rather monsters) are of the same condition with those, whereof the Prophet Dauid speaketh, saying, The foole hath said in his heart, there is no God. True it is, that of those that speake in that sort, there are two kinds. The first, say it onely with their lips ; the other shew it by their workes. The Iewes whereof Dauid spake, shewed both in their liues and conuersations, that they knew not God in their hearts : for that it is, which the Prophet noteth in them, adding to the place aforesaid this prooffe, They haue corrupted, and done an abominable worke. But at this day among those that beare the names and titles of Christians, there are not onely such men, as resemble the Iewes in this respect, but also that say, both with mouth and in heart, blasphemously and abominably, that there is no God. It is for certaine, a most horrible thing (and yet very true) that there is no nation so barbarous, nor people so brutish and sauage (as a learned Pagan confesseth) which are not perswaded in their hearts, that there is a certaine Deitie, and a Soueraigne Essence, aboue all things : and neuerthelesse, there are such senselesse blockes, among those that haue receiued the sacred seale of Christianity, that they are vtterly void of that naturall and vniuersall touch and feeling, or that at the least, seeke by all the meanes they can, to suffocate the same, daring to deny God, with their stinking and abominable mouthes. It is a iust and fearefull Iudgement, which the great Iudge of the world, executeth vpon those, that are wholly plunged, and as it were swallowed vp in the vanities and delights of the flesh, thinking no more of God, then as if hee were not. It is a most extreame vengeance, which the most puissant God letteth flye like an arrow, against those miserable men, who to addict their minds, (and without remorse of conscience) to abandon themselves to all corruption and filthinesse, maliciously inforce themselues, vtterly to deface out of their soules, the reliques of the diuine Image, which beareth them witnesse of the Deitie, and of his providence and iustice. It is the punishment that those men deserue, who to fill vp the measure of their iniquities, when they affirme any thing ; yea, and often times in vaine speeches and communications, dare vomit, and cast forth into the aire a denying of God. It is the reward which the Eternall giueth vnto the ingratitude of many men : who to addict themselves to the fond dreames of their owne imaginations, haue despised the treasure which Christ hath opened vnto vs in his holy Gospell. To be brieue, it is the last and most great persecution, whereby the children of God, shall be prooued in this latter age of the world, when monstrous Atheists shall mocke at their simplicity, and at their constancie, in keeping themselves (as neere as possible they may) from doing euill, for the hope they haue in the Lord, and because they feare his name. Now as there is no greater, nor more mortall wound, then to pul a mans heart out of his body, so there is no poyson more powerful, nor plague more puissant, then suddenly to kill in him, the life of his soule (faith and charitie) and (consequently to cast him downe headlong into the gulf of death and hell, with the diuell,) to deny the principle of all things, and the foundation of all Religion, which is that there is no God.

Psalm. 14.

2. Three wayes and meanes to know God, and one onely to conceiue what he is.

The Theologian Philosophers teach vs three wayes and meanes to know God : by the instinct of nature. The one is, by the negatiue of all imperfection, in acknowledging the Deitie to be immouueable, vnchangeable, eternall, without substance, and infinite. This is an euident and cleare way to teach vs, not what God is, but what hee is not : wherein neuerthelesse, we haue as it were but a Preface, to know what God is. The second meanes to knowe him, is by his effects, which are the creatures ; but it is very true and certaine, that the effects doe not alwayes wholly represent their causes : specially in things that are finite ; how much lesse then in things that are infinite ? Wee cannot learne, nor iudge by the effects, of the Spirit of man, nor of the sunne, what those two singular creatures are. Then how shall we know by finite workes, the efficient cause, or that which giueth essence vnto nature. The third meanes to attaine to this knowledge, is by the number of perfections that are found ; and may bee in all creatures, and in all essence ; whereupon God is called called Goodnesse, Wisedome, Power, Life, Truth, and Iustice, which perfect qualities, dispersed by piece meale, and in some measure in things created, are heaped together, vnted, and without measure in God, and therefore he is called Infinite. But because these are qualities subsisting in some kindes of substance, and that in God there is no qualitie, he being all substance and essence: and that every one of them, cannot be finite in God, (for he is altogether infinite) nor infinite in him, (for then there should bee many infinities, and God onely is infinite.) Therefore it is evident, that man cannot well knowe the Deitie by the perfections aforesaid. We cannot vnderstand nor imagine any thing, but by the means of his proper essence, and by comparing and measuring it, with the qualitie that it hath; whereby it happeneth, that wee forge and make of euery thing, some corporall Image, being not able by any meanes, without that resemblance, ground, and principle, to conceiue or comprehend any true essence. Which moued a Pagan to say, that if beastes should make themselves Gods, they would forge and fashion them like vnto themselves. But this is no certaine meanes, nor way to knowe God, which is no corporall body, but altogether spirituall and infinite. So that is a false resemblance which wee giue to God, of more or lesse; when wee attribute vnto him, some thing more specially then other, as beeing more his, and more certaine testimonies of his providence and iustice: and that oftentimes we become so audacious, or most ignorant comptrollers of his Iudgements, and workes. Which commeth to passe, by reason that wee esteeme, and so much the more apprehend things, how much the more they touch and concerne vs. And as if the vniuersall deluge, was more to the Deitie, then a drop of riuer water; the Sunne, then a leafe of a tree; an Empire, then a flie; and all the world, then an Ante. But that is wholly to bee ignorant, what heaven is: for where there is more or lesse, there is no infinitie, and consequently no God. It belongeth and appertayneth to creatures, and things finite, to bee touched diuersly and vnequally; not to the eternall, nor to that which is infinite. But wee thinke, discourse, and iudge of God according to ourowne qualities and conditions: (for wee can neuer wholly separate our selues, from our selues) and therefore all these naturall wayes and meanes, carrie and drawe vs, farre from the knowledge of God. And which is more, if all that which wee say, and set downe of him, were strictly iudged and censured, it would bee, and is, meere vanity and ignorance. For besides that we can neuer say enough of him, yet those true things, and which appertaine vnto God, are corrupt, passing through our senses, and mouthes, and we neuer speake of him, but in some doubt and incertaintie, by the ouer great feeblenesse and weakenesse of our faith. And so the Incomprehensible abisme, and the inaccessible light, is on the one side, and our nothing, and lesse then nothing, and altogether darkenesse on the other side. Wherefore we say, that if there be any meanes, to conceiue and imagine the deity, in our vnderstanding, it is, when the Soule is distract from all other things, and eleuating it selfe, aboue the heavens, as in a wide, spacious, infinite, with a profound and chaste silence, and an imagination trembling with humility, (being very carefull and warie, not to comprehend, or conceiue in minde, any corporall thing, or that which is naturall) doth imagine a bright shining profundity, without ground, brinke, banke, hight, or depth: and as if the Soule, being as it were blindfold, should lose, drowne, and swallow it selfe vp in the contemplation of this infinite. But because it is most difficult, (if it bee not altogether impossible) for man to giue himselfe any such kinde of access to God: and that the Soule cannot long subsist, in such manner, remaining in his prison (the body) neither could in that estate, (rauid with feare) haue the facultie or opportunity to sue to God, in temporal manner, which is to pray to him, to acknowledge him, and to honour him; it being necessary in such things; to represent his creatour vnto himselfe, with some qualities as good, puissant, wise, vnderstanding, and accepting the vowes, and intents of his children. For these causes, I say, it is requisite, and the condition of this life cannot otherwise beare it, that euery one should make, and imagine vnto himselfe some image of God, which hee beholdeth with the eies of his minde, and firmly addresseth himselfe thereunto: and that is it, which he can imagine to himselfe of God. For the Spirit draweth the portraict to it selfe, eleuating his imaginations, aboue all things that nature hath created, & withall his force, conceiueeth a soueraign goodnes, power, & eternal perfection; which image neuertheless, is altogether false, that is lame and imperfect. For that the deity, being not imaginable, infinite, and altogether incomprehensible, to a humane Soule, there can be no true representation thereof, made vnto it. But it sufficeth, that it maketh it lesse false, lesse vicious, bigger, and purer, rer, then it can imagine or conceiue. The certaine patterne whereof, was reuealed from heauen to the patriarches, and ancient fathers of the Iewes, the first adorers and worshippers of God, as they also haue represented the same vnto vs, in their most anciēt & autentique writings. There he is named (I E H O V A) he that is, he that is only, and alone. And E H E. I E, E H E. I E. I am, that I am, The eternall, Lord, most mightie, Creator, and Authour of all things, by whom all things that are made, haue their essence, in whose regard, all things are nothing, one, and infinite altogether: Father, Word, and Spirit, living, seeing, penetrating, and foreseeing all things, all wisdom and perfection, all knowledge and goodnesse, and the God of his people. Therefore, whosoever shall more highly, more worthily, and more purely imagine and conceiue of these names, and diuine qualities, shall haue a more beautifull, more certaine, and more true image of God.

3. A generall consideration of the world, in seuen demonstratiue reasons of the Deitie.

But to returne to our proposition, to correct the extreame folly, of not beleeuing that there is a God, and by that meanes to arme and strengthen our selues against so pernicious a temptation. First, wee will briefly set downe seuen naturall reasons and proofes of the Deitie: that done, we will proceed to the supernaturall. The first is drawne from the consideration of the whole masse of the vniuersall world, either generally or particularly. That which is generall, concerneth nature, the essence and order of this round world, wherein we must of force acknowledge, that there is an Authour of such an admirable building, and an efficient and soueraigne cause of the substance thereof, which is God. For first, if the world was made, and had a beginning, (which almost all humane Philosophers acknowledge, and the holy Scriptures both of the Prophets and Euangelists confirme it) it followeth, that there is a soueraigne Architector, and first cause, wherby the world hath his being: for it did not make it selfe, it being impossible, that any thing should bee the efficient cause of it selfe, otherwise it should bee before it was, which is a manifest impossibilitie, and contradiction; the efficient being alwayes before the effect. Secondly, wee must confesse, that the world was made either of some substance, or of nothing: If of a substance, necessarily there must be some first operative cause, that made and formed that matter and substance, and gaue an essence therunto. If of nothing, then by greater reason, it was requisite there should bee a most soueraigne power, (yea and infinite) that made and created this world without matter or substance. Thirdly, say the world was made in a certaine time, or let vs graunt, that it was without any beginning; yet wee must graunt, that there was an efficient cause, because it is finite. And things that are finite, subsist, and are of an other thing. That which is of it selfe, and by it selfe, is infinite: now that the world is naturall, and of a finite essence, all the parts thereof that are finite, and whereof it is composed, manifestly shew it. Therefore it is of an other thing, hath a cause of being, and was made: for what could bee the cause of the finitie thereof, and that it is no bigger, but onely the will and pleasure of him that created it? It is not want of space and place, which without the world is infinite. Neither is it because of the forme thereof, which being round, may neuertheless be infinite. Fourthly, this great world is a body composed, & made of diuers pieces, and those contrary one to the other, linked together, as heate, cold, drie, moist, sweet, bitter, plaine, rugged, polished, rough, strong, and weake. Which contrarieties cannot bee in a first and simple matter, which receiueth no composition. Therefore it being very true, that so many contrary things that are in the world, could not of themselves ioyne one with the other, much lesse agree & maintain themselves together (seeing that naturally they seeke to destroy one the other, it must necessarily follow, that one more wiser, and more puissant, did put his hand thereunto, to ioyne them together, as it were by force, and then to maintaine them in that mixture. For a thing that is composed, and made of pieces, is imperfect, and therefore is not of it selfe, but was made of some perfect and singular thing. For perfection and singularity, goe before imperfection, and plurality, as the vnite and number of one, goeth before all other numbers, whereunto it giueth a beginning. Now God is that perfect and singular thing. Fifthly, the moving thereof, so orderly, so iustly, to equally, so constantly, and so immoueably, necessarily proceedeth, and dependeth, vpon a most wise, and first motion, which is moued by no other thing. That which is moued, remooued, and thrust forward, is done by another. For nothing moueth, or hath motion of it selfe, otherwise one selfe same thing, should be, and not be, all at one time, but if it be mooued, guided or thrust forward, it hath no power of operative mouing of it selfe. Now all the world turnes about and is mooued, both in generall and particular, and all the parts thereof are in motion. Wherefore it followeth, that they are mooued by some higher power, which moouing all things, is not mooued by any other, nor constrained to any motion. Otherwise, it were requisite to haue an other superiour and stronger thing which should remooue it, and so we should still stand vpon the point of infinite, which is altogether absurd. It is necessarie to rest vpon the latter, which is, that mooueth all things, and is not mooued by any thing. Whereupon, let vs againe note that this moouing is perpetuall, and vniformally. For the heauens mooue alwaies, and that orderly, which sheweth a most great power & wisdom in the first moouer, which is God: by whom all things are mooued by degrees, and the weakest by the strongest; for bodies are mooued by their spirits, and the vertues hidden in them, and all inferior things by the heauens: so that wee must grant our first proposition, which is, that being of himselfe immoueable, vnchangeable, and an eternall rest, he mooueth all things. Seuenthly, it is certaine and euident, that all things naturally tend to some end, for the which they worke, and not onely euery one in particular, for his owne regard, but altogether, as with one accord and with one motion to attaine to a common and general end, which neuertheless cannot be done, vnlesse the cause be knowne by whom it is; and who knoweth and vnderstandeth the generall intent of nature, to incite and mooue euery thing to his action. Now it is most sure, that almost all creatures are ignorant, wherunto they tend, and what causeth them to persist in motion, because they haue not that vnderstanding that is requisite thereunto. Whereupon we conclude, that there is a first, soveraigne, efficient, and intellectuall cause, which knoweth and vnderstandeth, the end of all things, and vnderstanding and overseeing them all, thrusteth them forward to their action, and guideth and leadeth them to their end, both generally and particularly, which is so strong a reason, that the same alone, constrained the Pagan philosophers, that doubted of the deity, to say, that there is a kind of working nature, that is, efficient, mouing, and thrusting all naturall things to their end: and so in despite of their hearts, to confesse a God, vnder a feminine word of nature.

4. Speciall consideration of the World in seuen principall things, which make a certaine prooffe the Deitie.

Touching the reasons and naturall proofes, which are more particularly drawne from the consideration of the whole world, It shall suffice to set downe and touch seuen onely, out of a great number. First, if wee consider particularly the great multitude, and in a manner, infinite number of things created: and in them, the varietie so diuers, and so many, and in both of them the disposition so well composed, the ranking so beautifull, the ordering so harmonious, and the concord so firme; we must be forced necessarily to draw and reduce all that, to a first infinitie and vnitie most fertile, most puissant and most wise. For they are all firme and certaine maximes, that multitude proceedeth of vnity, variety of abundance and fertilitie, and that order and concord, (different in plurality) are, and maintaine themselves, by a most great and powerfull wisdom. Secondly the making, and in it the building, perfection, and beauty, not onely in grosse, of all the round world, but also of euery part and peece thereof in particular, can not be done, without a most great, and most wise workeman. The sight of a picture, maketh men conceive and know that there is a painter, and of a peece of worke, that there is a workeman, which much surpasseth his worke, as alwayes, the author and the cause, the doing, and the giuing, are more then the effect, and the receiuing. Behold the construction, and artificiall building of the heavenly vault, wherin are placed so many bright shining lights, which without ceasing, are in continuall motion ouer our head. Consider the forme of mans face, and the order and making of his inward parts, then of his soule, which is inuisible, the thoughts, discourses, and actions thereof, which cannot be comprehended: all that (yea and all that which we see in all creatures, euen in the little Ant, the feather of a bird, and the leafe of a tree) sheweth euidently, that all of them haue beene made to some end, and by a most great, eternall, and an inuisible workeman. Thirdly, the distinction, degrees, and parting of all things, and of their naturall essentiall qualities, which are reduced to foure principall heads, (essence, living, feeling, and vnderstanding,) constraineth euery reasonable soule to imagine a free and marvellous authour and worke master. We know that the greatest bodies, and the highest parts of the world, (the heavens & the elements) like great vessels, or strong planks, hauing but their simple essence, contain and sustaine all other things. Secondly, plants, trees, and hearbes, (richer neuerthelesse) which seeme nothing in quantitie to the heavens, and yet haue more then they, for they haue life and essence, and nourish themselves by their rootes. Thirdly, beastes, which are much lesse then the plants, (yet more excellent then the great celestiall bodies, trees, and herbes) haue their essence, liuing, and feeling, and make vse of the other two kinds of creatures, taking their nourishment from them at their mouthes. Fourthly, Man, much lesse, and feebler, then all that aforesaide, is enriched with foure degrees of qualities, (for hee hath essence, hee liueth, hee feeleth, and vnderstandeth) and serueth himselfe with the heavens, the elements, the plants, and the beastes; yea, and commaundeth most part of all those creatures. Thus you see, that great and strong things are meanliest provided for, and are subiect vnto, and serue the lesser and the feebler: which is a certaine argument, that they haue not provided for themselves, nor shared out their owne portions; but that there is a Master aboue all others that hath so, and as it pleaseth him, giuen to euery one a part, and hauing in that sort provided for them, maketh them liue in peace and concord. Fourthly, it is wonderfull to see the coniunction of things, and the interchangeable course, intelligence that they haue, and seruice that they do one vnto the other. For the heavens shine, heate, moylen, and make the earth bring forth and encrease, and not for themselves. The earth beareth and nourisheth the plants, and hath no neede of them. The plants nourish and feede liuing beastes, and other creatures, which with all the rest serue man. And such things serue one the other, without any benefite or profite vnto themselves. Wherefore being linked and chained in such manner, and tending all to one end, there must necessarily be one, that hath so knit them together, ordered, drest, & prepared them, to one end and purpose, which is God. Fifthly, the vertues, proprieties, and admirable and infinite excellencies that are in things, and so wisely diuided among them, the marueilous effects, and exquisite singularities of all and euery one of them, witnes, and clearly shew, that there is a most great and infinite giuer, and a soueraigne and most puissant Lord: for seeing that they haue not all these good things, and benefites of themselves, haue not giuen them one vnto another, haue not the power to refuse or to receiue them, knowe not that they haue them, nor reape any profit, honor, or pleasure by them: (for what knowledge hath the rose of her sweetnes? what profit or pleasure hath the adamant stone of his propriety, or precious stones of their singularity.) It must certainly, and of force bee, that such things haue received all these benefites and properties else where, & that some great, rich, good, and liberal Lord hath giuen the same vnto them, and in such measure as pleased him, not for their own sakes (because they know nothing, & haue no profit thereby, for their parts) but in consideration of some other, to whom that great master maketh them serue. Sixtly, we finde in all creatures truth and goodnes, and in euery one great diuersity, and many degrees: for euery thing hath his owne particular goodnes and truth, which maketh it differ from an other. Whereby we conclude, that there is a first, a soueraigne, and an vniuersall goodnes & truth, the originall fountaine, and spring, of all the singular goodnes and vertues, vnequally dispersed and diuided among all things. For that being not true and good of themselves (otherwise euery thing should be truth and goodnes) it must follow, that they haue received them from another. As a rose is a true and a good thing, and a good and a true rose, but it is not truth and goodnes, (for then it should no more be a rose,) but it is true & good: that is, there is goodnes and truth in it: Therefore that vertue is in it, by some other meanes. The like of a bird, and so of all other creatures. Whereby we are compelled to beleue, that there is an infinite truth and goodnes, and as it were a Sea thereof, which spreading running out and dispersing it selfe among all things, maketh them particularly, true and good. Which is God. And as we see that there is diuers degrees of more or lesse, in the goodnes and valew of euery thing, we must conclude, that there is a soueraigne essence, which is perfectly good and that how much the neerer any thing is, or draweth vnto it, the better it is, and how much the further, any thing withdraweth it selfe or is from it, the worst it is. Lastly, after all other things, for the seventh, and strongest reason, we must behold and looke earnestly into man, for whom all other things were made, and for whom also we labor in this our present discourse. Wee will not stand much vpon the body, although, that both within, and without him, in his speech, and in his naturall senses, there are many wonderfull things, and whereof a man might write a large volume: but herein, wee desire to be brieue. Let vs then specially ſpecially conſider how man is not the author of man, for that the generation of man is acted, when neither the father nor the mother thinke thereon, ſee it, nor deſire it, and oftentimes againſt their willes, being not able to beget children when they would, nor yet ſuch as for the time they wiſh or deſire, for ſometimes they haue a ſon, when they would haue a daughter, and ſo to the contrary. After that, the child beeing borne, is not any waies in their owne power or diſpoſition: for many times it dieth, when it is but an hower old, and ſometimes they neuer ſee it aliue. Againe, if man were the maker of man, he would make him great and healthful, and not lame, counterſeite, or miſſhapen: he would forme his vaines, pulſes, and ſinewes, and mix and interlace them orderly together, and with, and by moſt admirable art: he would faſhion his head and his braines, and make him a heart, a liuer, lights, and all the reſt of his intrailles, which are hidden within the body. But man himſelfe knoweth not, and is wholly ignorant, how his inward parts, and ſo many goodly members are made and compoſed, if hee hath not at ſome time or other, ſeene them in the ripping and opening of ſome dead mans body, and by that meanes the firſt man Adam, was there in ignoranter then any other, as hauing neuer ſeene them in that manner. Wee muſt then thereby conclude, that there is a moſt great, and admirable workman, which is author of all theſe things, and that aſt that it were wouen, & framed ſo many notable and goodly members, not being man, but much ſurpaſſing and excellling all other things whatſoeuer. And if it be alledged, that ſuch was the courſe of nature from the beginning, as of a nut which falleth downe from a nutte tree, there will grow vp in that place, an other tree of the ſame kinde, the nutte not once falling, nor thinking thereon, and that ſuch is the force, and order of naturall things; it muſt be knowne and prooued what nature is? Who hath given it that order, and that force, who made the firſt nut? who compoſed the body and members of the firſt man? who hath made and formed all other creatures? Who guideth and conducteth them, and is the cauſe, that there is no want of them? and to be briefe, who was the beginner of all things? But as wee ſay, and haue ſaid, a moſt puiſſant and ſoueraigne Lord, that worketh according to his will and pleaſure, as he hath created all things by his power; and moderated them by his wiſdome? Hauing ſpoken of the generation, and forme of the body, (wherin man hath no part; and to ſay truth nothing, as I haue ſaid) let vs come and proceede to the creation of the Spirit, which is as it were a bottomleſſe pit, which cannot be ſounded: how then could, or did man make it? In this ſpirit, there is a thouſand wonders, which all thoſe that are endowed therewith, doe not once vnderſtand. It hath an intellectuall quality, ſurpaſſing ſenſible things (for it vnderſtandeth them all) and which is more, that vnderſtanding diſcouereth, and conceiueth much more, and farre beyond all the ſences of man. Which euidently ſheweth, that there are intelligible things, aboue ſenſible things, and ſpecially one, which not onely ſurpaſſeth thoſe intelligible things, but alſo is aboue this vnderſtanding of the Spirit. It knoweth and vnderſtandeth all things; and yet cannot vnderſtand nor know it ſelfe, neyther doth it know from whence it hath that great ſufficieny to know the reſt. Therefore alſo it did not make it ſelfe, but of neceſſity it followeth, that there is an vnderſtanding, much aboue that of man, which knoweth it, & hath made it; and which vnderſtanding in vs, that which we our ſelues know not, giueth power vnto our ſoules, to vnderſtand that whereof they are capable. Againe, the thoughts of our hearts, the Imaginations of our braines, the deſires of our wils, and the conceptions, inuentions and diſcourſes of our Spirits, which are infinite, and which we cannot ſlay, change, nor order, but do rather wholly carry, lead and bury vs away at their pleaſures: So many wonders (I ſay) euidently ſhew and declare, that wee are not maſters of our ſelues.

But how ſhould wee bee maſters of theſe interior and great matters, and of ſo many admirable faculties of the ſoule, when we haue not the leaſt meanes or power that is, to make our ſelues a ſinger higher then we are, or to be longer or ſhorter then we be? Let vs then ſay and confeſſe, that there is a ſupreme Lord aboue vs, that is moſt great, puiſſant, of moſt wonderfull, and altogether perfect vnderſtanding, and infinite in all things: ſeeing that man (who in reſpect of the vniuerſall world, is as it were, but a ſmall graine,) is infinite in his thoughts, deſires, and affections. To conclude, heereby wee ſee how things in generall, and euery one in particular, in their ſeueral bodies, acknowledge, confeſſe, and denounce; in all true ſence, one God, authour, and ſoueraigne Maſter of all things, from whoſe maiesty and greatnes; it is impoſſible for man to hide himſelfe: for that at all times, in euery moment of time, and in all parts and places whereſoeuer, it preſenteth it ſelfe vnto vs, toucheth, ſtriketh, preſſeth, and vrgeth vs forward.

5. Other considerations of the former sene reasons, foure interior and morall, and three supernaturall and Theologicall demonstratives of the deitie.

Diuers other reasons, Interior, sensible, morall, proper, and naturall, with others higher, and more exquisite, supernaturall, and Theologicall, may here be inserted, to shew, not only that there is a first, soueraigne, and infinite essence, efficient cause, Lord, and providence of all things, which is God. But also, that in him, there is a soueraigne, and infinite power, knowledge, iustice and perfection. First, wee must necessarily consider the generall, vniuersall, and mutuall consent of all nations, and of all men, touching the beleefe & acknowledging of a Deitie. For all the people in the vniuersall world, that are, or ever were living on the earth, from the first day thereof vntill this present time, naturally haue, and doe confesse, that there is a God, or Gods. All the Philosophers, Historiographers, and Pagan Poets speake and make mention of their Gods, and inuoke, and call vpon them. And although that the most, and greatest parte of men, haue worshipped, honoured, and called vpon false Gods, that odoration, neuerthelesse doth testifie, and confirme, that all of them haue that in common, and generally, to beleue that there is a deity, and that they thinke that they serue the true God, and so manifestly condemne those that acknowledge no God. Further, this diuersity of Gods, imagined by the Pagans, evidently proueth, that to beleue in a deity, is not a doctrine learned or taught in common schooles, or a complot made among men, but that it is nature it selfe, common to all men, that teacheth them that there is a God. The second reason is, the manner of swearing, or ministring of an oath vnto all men, to maintaine and vphold all that which is true, and to obey his word and commandements, for that is as much as to confesse that there is a God, which knoweth the secrettes of mens harts, loueth truth, and punisheth all falshood. Thirdly, the prompt, willing, and in no sort premeditated inuocation of some aide and soueraigne extraordinary succour, when a man findeth himselfe in any great, or violent danger, disaster or distresse, evidently sheweth and testifieth, that there is a certain natural impression of a deity, and a kind of religious seed in the soule of man. It is the nature of euery thing to turne and addresse it selfe, (and that insensibly) to his beginning then this inspiration, beeing meerely naturall, cannot be vaine, but sheweth and proueth evidently, not only that there is a God in the world, but also that he knoweth all that is done therein, that he can remedy and helpe all things, and that he hath a care of al humane things. Fourthly, we are to consider, and to thinke vpon the feeling and remorse of conscience, so violent, and passionate, full of torments, disquietnes, & troubles, from which wicked men: by no means can be freed. For it is an infallible argumēt, of a superior souerainitie, before whom they must render an accōpt of their actions, & what other may be gathered hereby, that all apprehension of feare of men, being taken away, in a fact secretly committed, where there is no witnes nor apparant accusator, in case where the delinquent or malefactor is of so great power and authority, that there is no iudge to whom he is to render or make accompt of the fact, or where hee hath beene absolved or acquitted by the Magistrate, the soule or conscience neuerthelesse, is so cruelly tormented, with interior fury, and vexed with torments and feare, that all the pleasures, exercises, flatteries, and passetimes, wherewith other men recreate themselves, can by no meanes appease, or ease his minde, nor once suffer him to take any rest? This proceedeth not from the motions of the soule it selfe, because it loueth and cherisheth the body, as much as possible it may or can, and seeketh not, the trouble, disease or torment thereof. So that we must confesse, and acknowledge that it is some most great powerfull maiesty, some most redoubted and soueraigne superiority, from the which that which is the principall part in man, cannot hide nor vnlose it selfe, by whose handes it findeth it selfe fast caught, and surprisid: who louing vertue, vprightnes, iustice, and truth, punisheth and severely reuengeth all euill. So many seuerall things then, already touched and declared to that purpose, beeing so vniuersall, we must acknowledge them to be naturall, and consequently true. For it can not be sayd nor alleadged, that it is fortune (as men call it) much lesse the reasons so diuers, and flowing in discourse, that hath so generally, and constantly perswaded all men to the beleefe of a deity. Therefore, we must necessarily grant, that it is nature, or to speak truth, God. And in truth it is a touch or feeling of his maiesty & greatnes in all mens harts, and in the soule of nature it selfe. For that which some men do reply and alleadged against it, hath here no place, which is, that the cause why men doe beleue in God, proceedeth from the craft and subtilty of those those men, who seeking to obtain an authority and principality ouer others, and to procure the more credit to their lawes and ordināces, boasted & made the people beleue, that they had some secret cōmunication with the gods, & that they had receiued those lawes and statutes from them, which they commanded to be obserued and done: for of what weight or moment could such dissimulation & fained shewes be with men, if first the perswasion of a deity (which men should feare to offend) had not bin naturally imprinted in their harts? for if they had not beleueed it, without doubt they wold haue mocked those that said they had spoken with the gods. And which is more, they themselues that vsed such policy & craft, are also witnesses, that all men beleue that there is a deitie. And to proue it, reade all the books that haue bin composd & written from the beginning of the world vntill this time, & you shal find but very few mē that are noted to haue maintaynd that blasphemy, that there is no god. There is mention made of one Diagoras Melitus a Poet: of one Theodorus Cerenus: of one Ehemerus of Tigee, & some others that were esteemed Atheists. And yet they were not thought to be such, for hauing denied that ther is a God (for Diagoras in the beginning of his verses, confesseth that the deity guideth and conducteth al things) but rather because they mocked at idols & the multitude of gods. As Ehemerus was called an atheist, because he wrot that the gods of the gentiles were excellent personages, seeing their pourtraits which were kept in memory of them, had bin conuerted into idols. And in the same bookes we read, that Protagoreus, for writing in the beginning of his book, I haue nothing to say or do with it, whether there be gods, or no gods, was banished out of Athens, & the territories therof, & his books puplikely burnt. As there were also certain Philosophers named Septiqueis, that doubted of the deity; but that was because their profession was to doubt of all things, yea, of that which they saw, and touched, and which is more, whether they were, or were not in essence. Now those that beleue not their owne sence and feeling, as that blacke is blacke, that fire is hote, that snowe is white, and that yce is cold; and to be brieft, that doubt of that which is seene, touched, or heard by themselues, are truly & directly senseles and mad, and yet lesse mad then Atheists, because they doubt that there is a God; and the Atheists flatly denie it. Let vs go forward with our reasons, & speak of those that are supernatural, & theological. 5. It is worthy the noting, that besides, this that al the cōpany of the most noble philosphers, openly & plainly confessed, the Holy Scriptures witnes the same, & experience teacheth vs; that there is a certen inuisible, & spirital power, greater & stronger then al humane vertue, because it is ouer ruled, & strangely insulted vpon by the other. Which is that of wicked spirits good or euil demons, which not only violate, torment, & hinder mens bodies, from doing their natural & ordinary functions, but also trouble & tormēt their soules, corrupting their imaginatiōs, & peruerting their iudgmēt. Al this cānot be denied, nor dissēbled by Athists. They heare & vnderstād a foole, a child, & a woman, speak greek, Latin, & other strangelanguages, & vtter certen propositions of doctrine, which they in no wise vnderstand. They see strange things done, which are not acted by the wit, capacity, or suffrance of him that doth the, nor by any other humane power. And they cannot say, that the diuels which act such prodigious things, are not enemies vnto mē, & of power sufficiēt vtterly to destroy them. Which are al proofs, that there is yet a higher power, that cōmādeth & ouerruleth the power of the Demōs or diuels, & which they serue & obey, as there is no family, no assēbly, nor any order or estate, without some head or gouernor. Thē is it the soueraign & diuine power (that is the deity) which presseth down, driueh away, & ouercōmeth those inuisible & spirital powers. Which caused Socrates, being accused not to beleue in the Gods, for his own purgation, & excuse to say, that he had taught his Disciples to beleue that there are Demōs which are but the childre & ministers of the Gods. 6. There is a certen great & clere proof, of most excellent & diuine vertue in miracles, wherby the rule, order, & course of nature, is altered & chāged, & in al ages there hath bin such miraculous actions, done & accōplished in the world, which cannot be doubted of, nor called in questiō, but by Acariastias, or haire braind, & vnreasonable men, wherof the bookes, histories, credible reports, & testimonies of al nations & people, are exsant to be seene. Whereby we are taught, that there is a greater and more puissant then all the world, and nature, that sheweth himselfe by those supernaturall actions, to bee aboue the law, that he himselfe hath established, and that dispenseth therewith, when, where, and as it pleaseth him. Which is God. Lastly, for the seuenth reason, The predictions of things to come, and in time to happen and fall out, which haue not any cause, or ground in nature, at the time when they are foretold, and not at haffard, generally, obscurely, or counterfeitly, but are certainelie specified and determined to bee done, and to happen at a time preordained: and which afterwards haue their true and

and 17.

certaine execution, and euents in euery point as they had bin foresheued, are to be considered and specially noted. For that such cleare, manifest, and infallible knowledge of future things, cannot be but in the infinite Spirit, eternall Authour of all things, in whose sight all things are perpetually present (that is God) who reuealeth & openeth them to men, by those of who he will be seru'd to his glory, whether they be christians or pagans. As Esay notably foresheued the natiuity & name of king Cyrus, and that he should set the Iewes at liberty, a hundred yeres before that prince was borne. And Daniel manifestly prophesied of the foure monarchies, before the first of them hapned; and more then that, hee did certainly, and a long time before speak of the desolation & end of the Iewish religion. The Sibylles also foresheued many things with great certainty: but specially we must note the prediction & foresheuing of christian religion, described & promised not generally & confusedly, but clearly and particularly, in all the severall parts therof, many ages before it was known, or heard of in the world: for in all times and ages, yea, & in all precedent religions, there was most worthy personages, that were admired and much esteemed of by men, (as the prophets among the Iewes, the Sibylles & the Poets among the Oracles, & Grecians) that wrot, foresheued, and celebrated christian religion, the foundation wherof is to beleene in one only true God.

6. The conclusion of this Chapter.

So many cleare, and diuers sorts of testimonies, being set downe and produced, which all conclude and affirme a deitie, wee cannot say otherwise, but that it is a most vnmeasurable pride, most shameful infamy, and a most desperate and beastly opinion, to deny that which is beleueed and vniuersally confessed by innumerable millions of people; & which is more, that which the discourse of reason, our imagination, & our vnderstanding teacheth & sheweth vs. For seeing the spirit is capable of it selfe, to apprehend the beliefe of a God, and that reason leadeth vs vnto it, nothing can hinder or impeach vs, to giue full credit therunto. Now seeing this spirit is able to conceaue a most high, most puissant, most good, and in all parts most perfect essence; & not only that, but most certainly conceiveth that soveraign vertue, and is thereunto led, yea, & as it were thrust forward, & forced by many arguments and reasons, in considering, orderly placing, and composing the goodnes, beauty, singularities, and excellencies that are in all things, both vnder & above humane nature, and causing the imagination of her thoughts to roue about, & to mount vp on high, to search for, & to conceiue of a more perfect nature, vntill such time as in a manner blindfolded, it ariseth vnto such a heighth, and so cōpleat an essence, that in the meditation therof, the sight of her vnderstanding is troubled, and in a maner lost with feare, admiration, & respect, which must needs be God, the first, eternall, & soveraigne efficient cause of all things. We must conclude, that by good right, we haue placed and set down the first and extremest folly in man to be, not to beleene that there is a deity; it being most true, that it is the means to abolish & abandon out of our hearts, all feare of doing euill, and to annihilate all affection and desire in vs, to addict our minds vnto piety, charity, holines, patience, and humility. It is the true and only meanes, to transform and change a man, not so much into a beast, as into a devil, yea, & into a far worse nature; for the devils beleue that there is a God, and tremble at his name (as the holy scriptures beare witnes, & diuers writings of the Pagans.) Wherefore let vs constantly renounce, and vtterly forsake this folly, and madnes of the Atheists, and abhorring the very thought therof, beleue in God, not only our creator, (as it evidently appeareth by all his works) but also our redeemer, that is (to speake with the Apostle) manifested in the flesh, iustified in the spirit, seene of angels, preached to the Gentiles, beleueed of the world, and mounted vp into glory: for that without this knowledge of the true God, we are but ignorant of him.

James 2. 19.

1. Tim. 3. 16

That men ought to renounce the second follie, which is to esteeme man more then God. Chap. 3.

1. Of those that denie the Deitie by their works, because they know not the providence of God.

Tit. 1. 16.

Let vs follow, and goe forward with the foundation of our Philosophy, which is to forsake & renounce all our follies, and thereby grow wiser in time to come, that so we may be answerable to our vocation of the children of God: and hauing spoken of those detestable monsters, that denie the Deitie, both in heart and mouth, we will now say somewhat of those, who making a profession to know God, deny him in their works, (as Saint Paul saith) which follie is found to be eminently, and meerey followed with a common error, in all places places where man is more esteemed of then God. For to confesse & acknowledge the soueraign creator of all things, & to esteeme lesse of him then of his creature, is as much as to acknowledge & avouch him with our mouths, and to deny him in heart & action, and so to weare the livery of those, of whom the Prophet David speaketh, saying, The foole hath said in his heart there is no God, they have corrupted themselves, and done an abominable worke. This folly is much more vsed and common then it is thought to be: for it proceedeth of diuers causes, which in a maner draw men to iniquity, as incredulity, doubting, grosse ignorance, or too slacke and cold a conceit of the providence of God, which is an assistance, & a wise conduction of all things to their end. Such men confessing that there is a God, doe not apprehend him as they should, that is, that he is soueraignly and vniuersally provident, both generally and particularly, all good and doing wel, hating iniquitie, iust punishing sinne, true & most puissant to accomplish his promises, and to execute his Iudgements, and of an infinite wisdom. From the which ignorance & corruption, there proceedeth singularly, these three vices, that we loue man more then God, that we put our trust & confidence in man, more then in God, and that we feare man more then God. Which are as many euident profes, & certain testimonies of the accomplishing of this folly, that we esteeme man more then God, & by good consequence also, that confessing the Deity with our mouths, we deny him in our workes.

2. Seuen reasons, and certaine proofes of the diuine providence of God, as well generall as particular.

The many and great numbers of reasons before set down & alledged, euidently shewing and prouing, that there is a deity, the soueraign & efficient cause of al things, do sufficiently conclude by necessary consequence, that the same God is soueraignly and vniuersally provident ouer al his creatures: for the proofes that serue for the first point, make for the second also: that is, to teach vs, that this diuine providence extendeth and spreadeth it selfe ouer all nature, as wel generally as particularly. It is a certain & an infallible truth, the which not onely the supernatural light of the heauens, & christian faith discouereth vnto vs, but which many infidels & pagans also by the only instinct of nature, & by the clearnes of humane reason haue acknowledged: which is, that the soueraign Lord of the world gouerneth & disposeth all the parts & pieces thereof, both high & low, little & great, vniuersall & particular, leading and directing the according to his good wil & pleasure, by his incōprehensible providence. In such maner, that he hath such a care of euery creature in his inseparable work, as if he had no regard at all of the whole specie, or generally of all things in the vniuersall world, & yet gouerneth al in such maner as if he had no care of any of them in particular. For euen as the Sun by his radiant beames giueth light to the moone, the starres, & the planets, & to all the celestiall hemisphere, & is of so great a force & efficacy, that it penetrateth euen into the bowels of the earth, therin to ingender gold, silver & other mettals, & in the sea, diuers pearles & other admirable rarities, there being no corporal thing, how base & vile soeuer it be, that doth not participate of his effects, & of his light. In like sort, and with an excellency, & admiration infinitely greater, God the creator, as the true eternal Son, & the cause of all moderation, order & iustice, illuminateth & giueth force and vigor, to all that which hath essence, which liueth, which feeleth, and which vnderstandeth, be it in heauen, or on earth, visible or invisible, there being nothing, that doth not participate with the beames of his brightness, and that is not by him directed & gouerned. To proue this, we will set down seuen certaine and manifest reasons. The first, that God is the creator of al things. For why should he make or create them, if he would leaue them at randon, or not bee pleased to conserue, guide, and conduct them to their ends by his diuine providence? And againe we see, whether we wil or not, that things go not by hazard or by chance; for therein we may clearly see, mark, & behold, government, policy and order, now who hath ordained it? or who maintaineth it? but only he that hath made all things? for there is as great, & the like power, goodnes, and wisdom to be required & had in wel gouerning of things, as to giue essence & being vnto the. And God is one soueraign, infinite, and perfect essence, one soueraign, infinite, and perfect vnderstanding, and in him essence & vnderstanding are al one. Now as in the creation of the world, the vertue of his essence was spread & extended it selfe ouer al, euen to the least parts of his works (otherwise they could not haue bin) so in the providence, that is, in the gouernment of things, his vnderstanding extendeth to al things, otherwise they could not continue nor attaine to their final ends. Besides this also, soueraign power & soueraign wisdom in the deity is but al one. For as his providence, extendeth it selfe to create the vniuersal world, and euery part and piece thereof, so doth his wisdom to conduct and guid them to their end.

For providence is no other thing, but a wise conduction, & ordering of things to their end. Secondly, we cannot deny, but that God is at the least, as great, good, puissant, wise & perfect, as the spirit of man, is able, or can conceive, or imagine him to be. But the Deity is infinitely above, and much surpasseth that imagination, as it hath already bin said. And the spirit of man may conceive a provident essence over all nature. Therefore also, Gods providence cannot be lesse, then that which our imaginations & thoughts conceive, otherwise the spirit of man which is created and finite, should be greater then the Creator which is infinite. Thirdly, if there be any thing hidden or exempted from the eternal providence, it followeth that it is not infinite, that it extendeth not it self over all things, that it is bounded and limited in some place, that it meeteth with some thing that is not within the limits thereof, that is without it, or beside it, or that passeth by it. And so it must necessarily follow, that either it is governed by it self, or by an other: which is to conclude, that there is an other God, and so two gods, & two providences: which is not so. Fourthly, if there be any creature wherof the eternall God hath no care, it must proceed from want of power, will, or knowledge how to conduct them, and in that case he should be no more all puissant, all good, & all wise. But he hath employed, and vsed all these his three essentiall qualities, to create all things: why then should he not be able to vse them, for the government of all things? what reason is there to confesse, or to deny, or doubt more of the one, then of the other? But he is much better, and more excellent, to be able, to know, and to governe and conduct all things, then to the contrary, and to provide for them, then not. Therefore, God doth the first & not the last. Fifthly all that which is good, faire & excellent in vs, is most perfect in God, for whatsoever is most exquisite in vs, is but as it were a dropping, or a very litle running out of that Sea, & infinite Spring of the bounty and beauty of God. Now in vs, and in all creatures, there is a certaine providence, whereby every thing provideth for it self, according to the nature therof. Then providence in God is most great, perfect & infinite. Sixtly, we are to consider, how that all creatures, how little soever they be, are so many feveral parts of the great vniuersal world, & that there is nothing, how smal, litle, or vile soever it be, or appeareth in our sight, but it belongeth vnto, & serueth for the state, perfection, & vpholding of this round earthly globe. Every piece therin hath his place, rank, quality, proper mouing, & certain action limited and determined. Not so much as a smal drop of water, the leaf of a tree, & the haire of our heads in such maner, that their mouing is the same with the vniuersal world. Wherefore it followeth, that the chiefe gouernor & supreme intendant general of so great a worke, should haue an eye every where, & vpon all things, and that vpon the very least things of all: for all appertaineth vnto, toucheth, & importeth him, in general, & in euery part, as we see great alterations, battels, subuersions of estates & empires, to spring, rise & come originally from most smal and light causes. Lastly, for a seuenth reason, & a most excellent demonstration of the providence of God, among an infinite of admirable things, which men plainly see practised & continued in Gods creatures, one specially is, the diuersity of humane shapes, such as that in so great, and as it were an infinite multitude of persons, there are not two among them that in all things resemble one the other: and which is more, this diuersitie is euident in the forme, lineaments, proportion, colour, gesture, voice, and hand writing of man. And euery one may comprehend and conceive, how much the same importeth, and is necessary for the good of humane societie, and what confusion and disorder would happen, if it were otherwise. Therefore it is vnto vs an inestimable benefite, and a most euident testimonie of a most attentiu, and most charitable eternall providence: otherwise there could not proceede and ensue so woonderfull and important a benefite. To bee brieue, out of so many reasons and arguments, this generall maxime is to bee drawen, that it is an infinitething, and a laborinth most troublesome, for those that breathe in this corruptible world, To thinke to discourse of, much lesse to discover and know the particular moings, effects, resorts, order and proceedings of the providence of God, as it is altogether much more impossible for them to vnderstand the cause thereof. For as there is nothing more secret then the Deitie, so all his works are most high, and most profound, and no creature whatsoever can sound into the depth thereof. His iudgements are like a great deepe, and no man can perceiue the traces or pathes of them. It is sufficient to admire and adore them in this life: we must be taken vp into an other life to vnderstand them. Humane curiositie oftentimes tormenteth and wearieith it selfe to finde them out, but at euery turning it is in a maze, and can goe no further. Therefore in a word wee say, that it ought to suffice Christian modestie, to beleue, that there is one onely, soueraigne, diuine, and vniuersal providence,

Psal. 36.6.

Iob 36.23.
and 26.

Ro n. 11. 13

dence, reaching and extending it selfe ouer all; which governeth and worketh by number, weight, and measure, in all things generally and particularly.

3. How wee loue man more then God.

To continue our proposition, and to shew by the three points aforesaid, that we esteeme man more then God: first, wee must presuppose, that our heart is like a vessell, that cannot continue empty, but wil alwaies be full, either of the loue of God, or of some other loue: and that the fuller it is of the one, so much the lesse it containeth & receiveth of the other. Now as the loue of God, and the loue of mortall things are contrary, & nothing comparable one to the other, it is impossible that they should dwell and be lodged in one selfe same heart, in any degree of perfection. And therefore he that desireth to fill his soule with the precious liquor of diuine loue, ought to seek and procure by all meanes possible, to exclude and drigue all other base and vile loue out of his heart. To this purpose an ancient Father said, Oh man, thou art a vessell, but a ful vessell, put out & empy that which is within thee, that thou maist take in that which thou desirest; put out the loue of the world, that thou maist be filled with the loue of God. And as every man knoweth the commandement of God, & our dutie requireth, that we should loue God withall our heart, with all our soule, & withall our strength, and the reason is twofold, that is, because he is God, and then, because he is our God. For being the eternal God, and infinite, only beautiful, & onely good, he is worthy to be beloued infinitely: and forasmuch as he is our God, creator and redeemer, we are bound to loue him only, and according to his commandement. Neuerthelesse, the common custom of men evidently sheweth, that we are so farre from doing it, that to the contrary, we loue man more then God; and to prooue it, let the married man but call to minde the loue that he beareth vnto his wife, the wife vnto her husband, the father & mother vnto their children, the children to their father & mother, and the loue of one friend vnto another, & they shal evidently feele and confesse, that they loue man more then God. Let vs proceed to the proofs thereof. We cannot indure that any man should blame or speake euill of him that we loue. If the husband heareth any man speake euill of his wife, or the wife of her husband, both of them will be grieued, and cannot beare therewith, but will be offended thereat. And how many quarrels are daily known, seene, and heard of, betwene those that beare armes, to be reuenged for a simple word spoken, which they imagine to bee preiudiciall to the honour of their friend, and for the which, to haue reason (as they tearme it) they freely and boldly venture their liues to all danger, and without all feare to damne their soules.

But when we heare any man blaspheme God our father, who is moued thereat? who taketh on him to find fault therewith, and seeketh to bee reuenged, or causeth the party blaspheming to be punished? Againe, every man taketh pleasure to heare men commend those whom he loueth, and to proue it. If any man in our company shall chance to commend our children, fathers, brethren, or friends, for their good behauiours, and vertuous actions, wee reioice thereat, and are glad. But if in the same company any man shall chance to speake of God, or of his goodnes & bounty towards mankind, his gracious government of all things, and his mercy in the free election of the faithfull, and of the continuance of his benefits towards them, (whereof the Prophet David hath made foure excellent Psalmes) who is it that will be lively touched therewith, and feele ioy, gladnes, and comfort at his hart, or will not rather be weary to heare the same? Againe, we speak willingly of those whom we loue, and are glad & reioice, when any motion is made in that kind, and we will be sure to enforce and continue the same. But when do we speake of God? And if in our company any man begins to make any discourse to that purpose, how is it followed or continued? To the contrary, how quickly, and how soone is it left of & forgotten? Againe, we doe not easily forget the man whom we loue with good affection, (as the Proverb saith; he that loueth well is slow to forget) we call to mind his face, his countenance, his gestures & qualities. But what mind or remembrance haue we of God? when do we thinke vpon him? when do we call to minde his maiestie, his works, and his graces towards vs? Againe, when to spare & keep our riches and our goods, for our children, we neglect our duties towards the reliefe of the poore, and are loath freely to giue any thing for the maintenance of the seruice of God, and his ministers, are wee not therein found guilty of louing man more then God, and our earthly children, more then our heavenly father? And how many are there, who being overcome by their affections, towards their wiues, their fathers, and mothers, or carried away with respect and loue towards their Kings, and Princes, forgette and Marth. 10. 37. neglect their duties towards God? Iesus Christ saith plainly, That in so doing wee loue man more then God. Wherefore by all these examples and witnesses, with many others, that might be produced and set downe, it may easily bee vnderstood, how wee loue, and consequently esteeme of man, more then God. Which is as much, as manifestly, and boldly to deny God, both in our hearts and in our workes; whom notwithstanding in the meane time, wee confesse and acknowledge with our mouthes. Saint Augustine saith, That we loue God lesse then we ought to do, when we loue any thing with him, and that wee doe it not for the loue of God. What doe wee then, when wee loue man, not for Gods sake, but contrary to his will, loue his creature more then himselfe? Which is so great a folly, that Christ himselfe said, That wee are not worthy to be his children, vnesse we bee willing and resolute to hate father, and mother, sister and brother for the loue of him: That is, to be reaued our selues of all our affections, that in any sort may withdraw vs, and our mindes from the seruice, loue, and obedience that we owe vnto him. Which wee shall doe, when wee loue God more then man, yea God onely and not man, but in God, and for the loue of God.

4. How wee feare man more then God.

The second prooffe, that we esteeme of man more then God, consisteth herein, That wee feare him lesse then we do man. Which is proued thus. When there is any crime committed by man, that is punishable by the Magistrate, there is no man so prodigall and careless of his life and reputation, nor so desperate, that will goe & put himselfe in the Officers or Iudges hands; and why? because hee would feare to bee apprehended and punished. So Theeues, and Routers hide themselves, in woods, and in canes, and come not abroad but in the night time. And the Scriptures saith, Whosoener doth euill hateth the light, lest his deedes should be reproofed. But God seeth all that is done, in the woods, in the night, and secretly, all our conceptions, desires, wils, passions, determinations, and enterprises, that are good, or punishable by the Law, or that are accursed, and merit eternall death, are open before the eyes of his Maiestie. Vnderstand you vnwise among the people, (saith David) and you fooles when will you bee wise? hee that planted the eare, shall hee not heare? or hee that formed the eye, shall hee not see? But in the meane time, are wee as fearefull to offend God, or do we feele such an apprehension, or feare of punishment, for offending him, as we doe when wee haue committed a crime before a mortall Iudge? Yet we know well, that such faults as are punishable by the Magistrate, are likewise subiect to the iudgement of God. It is certaine therefore, that those that commit them, flee the light, because they feare man, when it may be, they doe the like things secretly, in the presence of the Lord; thereby euidently shewing, that they feare him lesse then man. Yet we will confesse, That the feare of God is the beginning of wisdom, and that the feare of the Lord, maketh man abstaine from euill, as David and Salomon haue written. Neuerthelesse, if a Iudge should menace and threaten all those, that sweare by the name of God in vaine, that for every time that they should so doe, they should lose one of their teeth: the greatest blasphemer among them would reforme himselfe, and be so wary, that although hee were so much addicted to that vice that he could hardly leaue it, and so should lose some teeth for that cause, yet hee would be sure, not to lose them all.

Now God threatneth that he will not let them goe vnpunished, that shall take his name in vaine. And the paine and punishment of all sinne whatsoeuer, is much greater in his iudgement, then before the tribunall seat of man. And yet neuerthelesse, how many are there, that cannot speake a word without swearing? and to be brieue, how many frauds, deceites, vices, and iniquities, which deserue eternall death before God, are secretly dispensed withall by men, which they would be ashamed to commit openly, and whereof, if the Magistrate were informed, or vnderstood, and should punish them for the same, they would wholly abstaine from them? This folly then so great, to feare man more then God, cannot proceede from any other thing, then from this; that confessing and acknowledging God, with our mouthes, wee beleue not that hee is God, that is, seeing all things, holy, (for that he hateth and abhorreth all euill) iust to punish it, and most puissant to take vengeance therefore. Yet naturally we feare him more, that hath force and power to execute his menaces and threatnings heere on earth, then God that can punish vs more rigorously, more terribly, more certainly, and more infallibly. So wee feare more the menaces and threatnings threatnings of a man, then of a childe, of a Magistrate, then of a particular person, to lose our liues, then a small summe of money, and the rough words of man, that is of flayed iudgement, and temperate, then of a light hairebrained woman. But God is stronger, and infinitely puissant, then all mankind, to execute his iudgements, and his threatnings. All creatures are at his commaundement, to execute and doe his will, and pleasure; both Angels, men, and deuils: The aire by corrupting to infect vs; the seas to ouerwhelme vs; the earth to swallowe vs vp, and beastes to deuoure vs. What profound bottomlesse was Gen. 7. the waters had hee in his power, and at his commaund, when all the world was drowned, and the water overflowed, and was fiftene cubites above the highest mountaines in the world? With how many horrible plagues, neuer heard of before, did hee beate, and at last destroye Exod. 8, 9, 10. the Egyptians? With how many sorts of euills and scourges, did hee punish his people Leuit. 26. that rebelled against his commaundements? There is neither counsell nor force that can Deut. 28. preuaile, or resist against him. And to the contrary, what power hath man to hurt, that hath his being, his life and moouing in God? Againe, the paines and penalties of humane Lawes, can extend no further, but to the losse of mens goods and of their bodies, which of force must once die. But God hath power also ouer mens soules: and to that end, Iesus Christ admonisheth vs, not to feare them that can onely kill the body, but rather him, Luc. 12. 4. that after he hath taken their liues from them, can also cast their soules into hell fire. Man likewise cannot afflict or punish the body but for a little while: but God can doe it eternally, and without end. Besides that, the threatnings of men are oftentimes vaine, and easily altered and changed. But God is iust and true; so his threatnings are strictly executed, either in this life, or in the life to come, if they be not prevented by repentance, and amendment of our liues. The mightie God (saith the Prophet) is ielous, and the Eternall Nahum 1. reuengeth: hee hath furie at his commaundement, hee will take vengeance on his aduersaries, and hee reserueth wrath for his enemies. The Lord is slow to anger, but he is great in power, and will not surely cleare the wicked. And therefore also hee saith by Esay, Cease you from the man, whose breath Esay 2. 22. is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to bee esteemed? And againe, Who art thou, that thou art afraid & 23. of mortall man, and of the sonne of man that shall wither away like grasse, and forgettest the eternall that made thee, and created both heauen and earth? Let vs then learne by so many sacred reasons, to feare God more then man, and so esteeme of the Creator more then the creature, or rather not to esteeme of man, but in God: hauing in remembrance, that those men truly feare men; that feare not God more then men.

5. How wee trust more in men, then in God.

The third prooffe of the folly which is now in question, we haue already said to be, that wee trust more in man then in God: which corruption proceedeth from three principall grounds. The first, that we are so brutish, that as beastes apprehend nothing, but that which is before their eies, so we commonly beleue nothing, but that which we see. Now we see and behold men that haue means to aide and helpe vs, but we see not God and his power. Wherby it falleth out, that many put more trust in man, promising them nourishment, and that whereof they haue need, then in God, which giueth them his holy word to feed them and his promise neuer to abandon nor forsake them. Which is the cause that wee reape no profit by his aduise, when he sendeth vs to the schoole of birds, herbs, and flowers, therby to teach vs, that man being much more excellent & precious then they, before God; he ought to repose his trust and confidence in his providence, for all things that shal be necessary for him in this present life. It is true, that he chargeth vs first to seeke the kingdome of heauen, Matth. 6. 26. and the righteousnesse thereof, that all things else may be ministred vnto vs. Wherefore, being so negligent to doe that, which he commandeth therein; it is no maruell, if the distrust of his grace, maketh vs carefull for to morrow, and that we cast our eyes rather vpon men, then vpon God. Secondly, we are so carnall; that wee esteeme nothing to bee a blessing vnto vs, but onely that, which is pleasing and delightfull to the flesh. And for that men promise vs nothing, but that which is proper and commodious for the flesh: therefore we doe willingly, and rather hearken vnto them, then vnto God, that promising vs many blessings; aydes, and deliuerances, doth not alwayes accomplish such things, according to the desire of the world, and of the flesh, but spiritually, and for the good of the soule; and although he giueth vs much more then we aske, when hee causeth his spirituall blessings to increase in vs, in stead of those that serue onely for our bodies; neuertheless, our carnall reason can not comprehend, nor perceiue, that he accomplisheth his word, which is the cause, that if one doth promise to succour, aide, and deliuer a man that is sicke, poore, or in prison, he will put his trust more in him then in God, that promiseth him as much in the holy Scriptures. Whereby we evidently see, that flesh and blood, knoweth no other, but corporall aide, succor, and deliuerance, because God giueth it not alwaies, when we will, but oftentimes, changeth it into spirituall blessings, to much the more excellent, as they are lesse knowne vnto man. The third cause that maketh vs erre in this point, consisteth in the time of the accomplishing of that which God promiseth by his holy word. For according to his wisdom, sometimes he staieth long (as it seemeth vnto the flesh) to effect that which hee promiseth. Whereby man, hotte and impatient of nature, easily casteth his eye vpon that which he esteemeth to be neerer and readier, & so trusteth in man more then in God. Let vs here adde heereunto, that experience (as the Apostle saith) engendreth hope. Now as we finde succor and aide from rich men that loue vs, and haue means to do it and that on the other side, we doe not penetrate, nor enter so farre into the providence of God, as to know that he nourisheth, and so many; and so oftentimes, deliuereth vs from infinite inconueniences and dangers, it seemeth vnto vs, that by experience we finde more aide and assistance in men, then in God: and thereby also put our trust more in them (poore wormes of the earth) then in him, that is all goodnes, and all powerfull. Euen as children expect more aide, at their father and mothers hands, then from God, and the mother hauing given her child his breakefast, it is content, without asking more of her to serue him, fise or sixe daies after, & staieth til the next day, that she giueth him his breakefast againe. Whereas to the contrary, Iesus Christ hauing taught vs to aske our bread of our heavenly Father, but for one day, wee would willingly haue him to giue vs, as much prouision this day, as would serue to feede and cloth vs all the daies of our liues. So the woman that liueth by her husbands labor, with her children is quiet and content therewith, while he liueth, but when he dieth, she weepeth, and feareth to endure famine, or to fall into some other misery, in stead of trusting in God, which is the husband of widdowes; and the father of Orphans. So a meane prince hauing contracted alliance, with a puissant and almighty King, trusteth more therein, then in the alliance of God, that promiseth him to be his Protectour, and his Sauour. In like sort, it is our manner, confidently to lend a hundred pound to a marchant, vpon a simple bill of his hand, to pay vs againe at a yeeres end, with some small interest: and wee will not trust God with a crowne, when he sendeth one of his children to our doore to aske it vs of almes, and giueth his word for him, and which is more, promiseth to restore it vs againe two fold, with interest that shall continue for euer.

Rom. 8. 4.

6. The conclusion of this Chapter.

Seeing that hereby wee learne, that the corruption of our nature leadeth vs to beleene nothing, but that which wee see with our eies, to thinke that there is no other good, but that which is carnall, and not to acknowledge the wisdom of God, and his providence, in the dispensation and conduction of all things; whereby wee fall into these errors, to trust more in man then in God, to feare man more then God, and to loue the creature, more then the Creator, thereby truly accomplishing this folly, to esteeme of man more then God, which is as much as to confesse him with our mouthes & to deny him in effect, and in our workes. To amend this fault, let vs change aduice, that is, to loue and feare God, and to trust more in him then in man; because God onely is all vnto vs, and man nothing but in God. And to that ende, let vs call these places of the holy Scriptures to remembrance,

Jerem. 17. 5. Cursed is the man, that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arme, and withdraweth his heart from the Lord, for hee shall bee like to the heath in the wilderness. And a little after, Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope is in the Lord, for hee shall bee as a tree that is planted by the water side, which spreadeth out her rootes by the river, for whatsoever hee shall doe (saith David) shall prosper. Again, Woe vnto them that goe downe into Egypt for helpe, and stay vpon Horses, and trust in Chariots, because they are many. And a little after, Now the Egyptians are men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not spirit. But blessed is hee (saith David) that hath the God of Jacob for his helpe, whose hope is in the Lord his God.

That

That wee must amend our liues, and shunne the third folly, To thinke to liue euer. Chap. 4.

1. Man naturally inclined to incredulity, and to doubt of true things, which hee desireth should not come to passe.

Our third and principall folly is, to thinke to liue euer. This at the first shew, might seeme to many, to be some paradoxe, or rather a false supposition, for who is so ignorant as not to know, that it is ordained by God, that all men shall die once? and who seeth not this sentence daily and continually confirmed before his eyes, as it hath alwayes beene, from the beginning of the world? yet it is most true, that although we find by experience, that the course of our life, is like a little round circle, which having gone about and compassed, wee are suddenly and in a moment taken out of mans sight, as if wee had neuer beene? yet the knowledge of this fragility, is not well imprinted in our hearts, because that by our corruptnes of nature we lift not vp our eyes above earthly things, and againe, we are so inclined to incredulity, that the delaying, how short soeuer it be, of that, which we desire should not come to passe, easily taketh from vs, the remembrance that we ought to haue thereof, that we may not be surpris'd nor deceiued. That was the iudgement of the euill seruant, spoken of in the Gospell. And to the same end Saint Peter saith, That in the latter daies, their shal come mockers, which will walke after their lusts, and say, where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers died, all things continued alike from the beginning of the creation. And as it is written, that when God by his Prophets threatned the contemners of his word, they laughed, saying, Let vs eate and drinke, to morrow we shal die. And againe, we haue made a couenant with death, and with hell we are at agreement. Though a scourge runne ouer, and passe through, it shall not come at vs. In this manner, man naturally inclined to incredulity, easily doubteth of true and certayne things, if they be but a while deferred, specially when they desire not to haue them come to passe.

2. Testimonies to prooue, that man thinketh to liue alwaies.

Therefore (although we othwise confesse, and acknowledge with our mouthes, that we must once die, and proceed further (according to christian faith) to beleue that death is the entry and gate, either into paradise, or into hell) it happeneth vnto vs, as vnto them, whereof wee haue already spoken, who with their lips acknowledg a God, and deny him in their workes. For who is it that liueth here on earth, and thinketh as he should, and ought to do vpon the course which he ought to hold, to enter into the place of heavenly Ioy, and eternall blessednes, or to the contrary, on the other way, that he ought to leaue, which is to go to the place of weeping and gnashing of teeth? When we doubt, or beleue that we shall die within a day or two, there is none of vs, but will bee sorry and grieue that wee haue offended God, that we haue liued sinfully, in adultery, in deceite, disorderly, with an euill conscience, and vncharitably with our neighbours. And then we will desire to liue a while longer to amend our liues. And we will not want no vowes, nor promises to God, to liue the rest of our liues holily, and in feare and obedience vnto him. If he will be pleased to prolong our liues. And I am sure euery man will truly confesse, that if he should feele himselfe ready to die, he would willingly with sorrowfull heart, make the like vowes, promises, and protestations. God grant vs daily, and howerly time, leyser & means, to liue according to such vowes and desires. Why then doe we nothing? why do we not make hast to order the course of our liues in that manner, which we desire and wish we had liued in when we are ready to die? It is because we thinke not to die, and are so dull and insensible, that we thinke and esteeme twenty or thirty yeeres to be an eternity. For from thence proceedeth, this so great stupidity, that addicting our mindes wholly to the pleasures of this present life, we take order and provide for the affaires of this world, as if we should dwell therein, two or three thousand yeeres. As a Pagan very well noteth, saying. That there is no man, how old soeuer he be, that is not in hope to liue an other yeere: which is as much, as to thinke neuer to die: for when such a man shall haue liued an hundred yeeres, or two, he will perswade himselfe, that he shal liue a yeere longer, and that ended, that he shal liue another yeere, & so to liue ever. This is a wonderfull inconsideratenes. When a man is committed to prison, and hath receiued his iudgement to die, he thinketh vpon nothing else, but on the way that hee must goe, and detesting his former lewdnes, humbleth himselfe before God, abandoning all desire or care to lie soft, to eate and drinke of the best, or to weare costly and rich apparrell: And if he be a man wel instructed in piety and godlines, he thinketh vpon nothing els, but eternall life, & forgetting the world and earthly vanities, reioyceth in hart, that hee is ready to enter into, and to take possession of the kingdome of heauen. Now, wee haue receiued the Iudgement and sentence of death, from the first day and hower, that wee came into this world, and our soules are in our bodies, as in a prison, still expecting the hower and time of the execution. And accordingly, we all confesse, that we must die, and that we know not, whether it shall be within a day, or an hower, or lesse, and which of vs neuerthelesse, doth feelee, and sheweth himselfe disposed or prepared to die, as he doth, that is condemned to dy by a terrestriall Iudge? from whence proceedeth this dangerous carelesnes? But onely from this, that we thinke not to die, but rather to liue alwayes. If a woman, or a maide, preparing and making ready her best and richest clothes, and other ornaments to goe to a wedding, should feelee her selfe sick & ill at ease, & the Doctor hauing felt her pulse, should tel her for certen, that she should die within five or sixe dayes after, she would presently forget her going to the wedding, to weepe, to pray vnto God, to do Almes, to cry out vpon, and to blame the vanities of this world, and would aduertise and aduise her friendes, and companions, to leaue and forsake them, and in steade thereof, to doe good workes. Now God the soveraigne phisition of our bodies and soules, that knoweth the time and space of our liues, hath already warned vs of our deathes: he hath sayd that it shall bee very shortly, and giueth vs no assurance, respect, nor delay of five or sixe daies: no not of one day, nor yet of an hower. It is a common saying, that those that saile on the seas, are within two or three fingers breadth, of their deathes, that is as much as the thicknes of the planckes and wood of the ship is wherein they saile: for if those planckes were taken away, they should drowne, if they could not swimme like fishes. But without sayling on the Seas, or on the water, death is neerer vnto vs, when we beare, both about vs, and within vs, infinit causes and means, which put vs in danger, every moment of time, to bee stifled, and swallowed vp, waking, or sleeping, eating or drinking, at home or abroad, and at all times, and in all places, wheresoeuer we bee. In such manner, that in what good, and prosperous estate soeuer, a man thinketh or iudgeth himselfe to be, we many times wonder, and are abashed to heare that he is dead, before wee knew that he was sicke. Then wherefore doe we settle our mindes, our whole thoughts & our cogitations, to liue here according to the lusts and pleasures of the flesh? why are wee lesse aduised & carelesser then a woman or a maide that expecteth death every hower? why do we take so much pleasure in vanities, excesse and disordered life, like fooles? why doe we not addict our minds otherwise to the meditation of heavenly and eternall riches? wherefore doe we not imploy our time in such workes, as will be a comfort vnto vs, at the hower of death? and to bee short, why doe wee not amend our liues? because wee thinke to liue euer.

3. The breuity and vanity of our liues, most necessarily to bee considered of by man.

Plut. in Apophth.

We read of Antigonus, one of Alexander the greats successors, in a part of his Empire, that being healed of a certaine disease, said, That hee had thereby among other things learned, that he was mortall, therein discouering and shewing the aforesaid common opinion of man, to thinke to liue ever. Whereunto that also tendeth, that Philip King of Macedonia, every morning when he rose out of his bed, caused one of the Gentlemen of his Chamber to say vnto him, Oh King remember that thou art a mortall man. And to the same purpose also, serueth the common sentence, which we see many times written and set vp in tables, and vpon walles, and elswhere, Remember to die. But as the intent and purpose of that diuine proverbe, and of many the like notable instructions and auertisements, which wee finde in the holy Scriptures is to aduise and instruct vs, to liue in such sort, as that wee should alwayes haue in remembrance, that wee must die. So they are as many reproofes and reproaches vnto vs, thereby to condemne vs, that there is so great folly, and carelesnesse in vs, that wee thinke not to die. An extreame folly indeede: Seeing that experience, which is the Schoole of fooles, cannot provide a sufficient remedy against it. For the veriest veriest fooles and ideots in the world such as are not capable of discourse or reason, at the least learne by experience, that apples and peares rot, that greene trees die, being cut downe, that grasse whithereth, when it is mowed, and that flowers fade and die when they are gathered. This instruction, which by experience, sheweth and pointeth out things by the effects is so certaine and true, that if a Phylosopher would take on him to shew, and prooue the contrary, by reason and discourse: as for example that fire is colde, and snowe hotte, hee should bee woorse then a foole, and might be sent to the Schoole of experience, and tolde that he should put his finger in the fire, and his hand into the snow. The holy Ghost presenting vnto vs many registers and tables, since the beginning of the world, to shew that wee are mortall, and borne necessarily to die, speaking of death and of the liues of the first Auncient Fathers, saith, that if those that liued 900. yeares and more, were not at the last exempted from death. Now when the strongest and stoutest man, liueth not aboue 70. or 80. yeares, and that not very many, how comes it that wee thinke to liue alwaies? The world hath continued 5500. yeares and vpwards: and yet experience sheweth, that there was neuer any man (of so many millions that haue liued vpon the earth) that escaped death, but onely Enoch and Elias, that were transported without seeing death, (as the Scripture saith.) Besides all this, wee haue many mirrors concerning this passage of death, which God setteth before our eies, as Church yarges, graves, tombes, and dead mens heads and bones, gathered and laid together in the Church-yarges; which are specially as many testimonies, that wee also must die. And every time that we see a dead body borne to the graue to be buried, or that we heare a bell toll to a buriall, it is vnto vs as it were a herault, that crieth out and saith (oh man remember that thou art mortall.) Is it not then, a double folly in vs, and which sheweth vs to be more fooles, then fooles, who in this schoole of vniuersall and continuall experience, since the Genesis of the world, we cannot nor we will not learne that we must die? But behold an other greater and more euident testimony of our brutishnes, which is, that this life which we esteeme and thinke to be immortall, is not of any long continuance. Wee liue, as beleeuing that we shall liue eternally in this world, and wee cannot stay therein but a very short time. Moses in his song reckoneth our daies, as I said before, to be seventy or eighty yeeres, & yet of a thousand that are born here on earth, hardly two or three of them attain to that age. And the Prophet in the same Psalm, and verse, sheweth how that long life, of 70. or 80. yeeres, is quickly cut off, and will fly away. Then, what is 40. 30. or 20. yeeres in comparison therof, which the most part of men neuer attaine vnto? Let vs here then speak, (in the booke of Wisdom) that neuer thought to die, living in delights, honours, pleasures, and riches, and we shall plainly see, how they truly confesse their folly and abuse, saying (What hath pride profited vs? or what profit hath the pompe of riches brought vs? all these things are past away like a shadow, and as a post that passeth by, as a shippe that passeth ouer the waves of the water, which when it is gone by, the trace thereof can not bee found, neither the pathes thereof in the floods. Or as a birde flyeth through in the aire. Or as when an arrow is shotte at a mark.) In how many places, also doth the holy Ghost compare the life of man to a shadow, that fadeth away? how many times to the grasse, which yester day was greene, and this day is cutte downe and withered? how often to a flower, which yester day flourished; and this day is gathered and dried away? how oftentimes to a dreame, and as a watch in the night? and as Iob saith, that wee are but as yester day, and that his dayes are swifter then a weavers shuttle, and that they are spent without hope. Which made Saint Iames, liken our life to a vapor, which appeereth for a little time, and afterwards vanisheth away. The Pagans in times past, marking this, one of them said, That being borne wee die: an other, That our life is a path way, from one mother to another; that is, from the body of a woman, to the bowels of the earth: another, That man is but a water bubble. Another being asked, What hee thought of mans life, without making any answer, went into his chamber; and presently came out againe, therby signifying, that the life of man is but an entring into the world, and a sudden going out againe. Iacob hauing liued 130. yeares, said vnto Pharao, That the daies of his life, had bene short, in regard of those of his Auncessors, that had liued 8. or 900. yeares. What is 70. or 80. yeares then, which the strongest and stoutest men liue now adates, if they bee compared to the eternitie which shall follow and ensee this temporall life? It is not a drop of water in comparison to the Sea, nor a graine of sand, in comparison to that, which is in all the earth. Saint Iohn calling the time since the comming of Christ in the flesh, to the end of the world, The last houre, seemeth to deuide

the world into three or foure houres, whereof two or three of them were past vnder the time of Moses Law, and before, and we are now in the last houre. If 1500. yeares and more, are reckoned to be but an houre (how much lesse are they then being compared to the eternitie) the longest life of man cannot be a minute of an houre.

4. Conclusion of this Chapter.

Seeing that this false opinion to thinke to liue euer, maketh vs forget heauen for earth, the soule for the body, and heavenly, for terrestriall treasures: That wee may amend our liues, let vs change opinion, and being well perswaded that we must die, and that soone, and that our life is but as it were the length of a day, or of an hower, yea of a minute of an houre, let vs liue so, as if we should die euery day, or rather euery houre in the day. Let vs liue as we wish we had liued, when wee lye on our death beds: and employ that day or houre, that we breath our last, in the workes of pietie and vertue, which vndoubtedly will be a ioy vnto vs, when wee die, and glory and eternall blessednesse in the life to come. Let vs remember the tenne Virgins, in the Scriptures, that wee may haue oyle ready in our lampes, to enter into the Bride chamber, at the day of the comming of the Sonne of man, to iudge the quicke and the dead. Let vs not (for a daies, an houres, or rather a minute of an houres carnall pleasure, which the longest life of man, can or may taste, haue or feele.)
 Matth. 25.1. vs deprive our selues of that spirituall ioy, which can neuer bee taken from vs. Let vs not loose the fruit of the tree of life, for an apple that beginneth to rotte. To be short, seeing we must die, and know not the houre, and that it will soone come, let vs liue like men condemned to die, and that stay but for the time of execution. And to frame and fashion our selues vnto that wise course, Let vs say with Moses that great man of God, Lord teach vs to number our daies, that we may apply our hearts vnto wisdom. For this praier is of no small importance, although it seemeth no difficult matter, to know how to number and tell 70. or 80. yeares, which the Prophet doth limit our daies to be. But therein hee sheweth the dulnesse of man, in not being able to comprehend the shortnesse of our life, by reckoning it to be of so small continuance, and that the holy Ghost must necessarily, by his secret wisdom worke in vs to teach vs to know and finde out, so necessarie a doctrine, to the ende (as hee addeth) That wee may apply our hearts vnto wisdom. That is, that leauing and forsaking the vanities of the world and of the flesh, which lightly fade away, wee may addict ourselues to that, whereof the blessed fruit will remaine with vs for euer. That is, that we should renounce and forsake this folly, to thinke to liue alwaies in the world, and that when wee die, wee may happely enter into the ioies of the kingdome of heauen.

Psal. 90.12.

That it is requisite and necessarie for man to free himselfe of the fourth folly, which is, Not to know wherefore we liue. Chap. 5.

1. All things created for two principall endes, The one neere at hand, or first, the other farther off, and last.

All the creatures that are, that liue, & that haue any sence & feeling, are made, or dayned, & created, for 2. special and principal endes: The one, which is as it were, at the beginning of euery thing, the other, the latter. The beginning of the heauens is to moue perpetually, and the end, (because of the obiekt whereunto they tend) is to shine, heate, moisten & cause the earth to bring forth fruit, &c. The first end of plants is to receiue vegetiue life from their roots, and to grow and bring forth seede, thereby to continue and perpetuate themselves, in their kinds. The latter to feed and nourish liuing creatures. The first end of beasts is to liue and feed themselves, the latter to serue man, to the which end also, all other creatures tend. Whereupon, if you aske man, the reason why God made and created the earth, he will make answer, and say, that he did it, for men and beasts to dwell thereon, and to nourish herbes, plants and trees. And why he made the sea, he will say, for navigation, and to nourish fishes. Wherefore he made stones, he will tell you, to serue for building, and making of houses. Wherefore he made plants and herbes, he will say to nourish all liuing creatures tures, wherefore he made fishes, birds, and other kinds of beasts, he wil reply, that they were made, some to serue for nourishment for man, & others to draw and beare burthens; and so of other things, for others and diuers vses. And soring vp higher, he will tell you why God created the Sun, the aire, and other creatures. He can discourse and speake of the admirable course of the heavenly spheres, & calculat, that the Sun in 24. houres compassing about the whole world, doth consequently goe every houre 260. Dutch miles. And that the heaven wherein that admirable great light is contained, is distant from the earth 1202700. miles, so that it is incomprehensible in humane vnderstanding, to set downe the number of miles, that the Sun goeth in his heavenly circle every day. Man also taketh on him to measure the compasse of the earth, and affirmeth that the earth and the sea together, are 6300. Dutch miles in roundnes or circuit: and that the body of the Sunne is 166. times bigger then the earth. How great then is the heaven wherein the Sun is? But of what greatnes is the highest heaven, enuironing all the other heavens, wherewith that heaven where the Sun is, is inuironed: and that with a most admirable distance? Man can discourse and reason of all these things, yea, glory and boast in himselfe to think that they are and subsist, for his good, benefit and vse. But if you aske him why God created him, and wherefore he lieth? he wil either make you no answer at all, or else say little or nothing to the purpose.

2. It is a most necessary thing for man to know himselfe, and the end for the which hee was borne.

The Phylosophers and Theologians agree in this point, that the whole summe of mans wilsdothe consisteth in two points; that is, that man knowing God, knoweth himselfe also: and that this knowledge of himselfe is two fold, that is (as the Phylosophers say) the wisdom that we haue by the true feeling of the perturbations and disturbances of the soule, and that which wee get by good and perfect reason, to purge and cleane the soule from vice, and to make it happy: either by Stoike vertue, by contemplation Parepatike, or by Academicall indeuour. But to speake more properly with the Theologians, it is, that we must learne to know what wee were at our first creation, and what we became after the fall of the first man Adam. Now in him we were created after the image of God, which is all righteousness, holinesse, goodnes, and vprightnes. And in him also we fell from all those diuine graces, into vnrightheousnes, corruption, malice, and iniquity. Touching the end wherefore man was created, it may likewise (as in all other creatures) bee considered two wayes. The one first, the other principall and last. The first end of mans creation consisteth herein, that God said to Adam and Eue, after he had created them, Increase, multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it, and haue dominion ouer the fishes of the sea, the fowles of the aire, and every liuing thing that mooueth upon the earth. For thereby man is bound to increafe and multiply humane kind, to gouerne his house, his family, and publike affaires, and to all good & laudable actions, and contemplations. But his latter and principal end is, the glory of God, and to be conioined vnto him, therby to attaine eternall beatitude. For God that might haue contented himselfe with his owne glory (which he had from all eternitie) would manifest the same vnto men, that it might bee knowen, acknowledged, and magnified by them. Therefore he created man according to his owne image and likenesse, that by the bright shining beames of his light, holinesse, righteousness, and truth, together with the remembrance of the dominion and rule giuen vnto him ouer all creatures, he might bee led to the knowledge of the Sun of righteousness, goodnes, wisdom, and soueraigne power, to loue God his Creator, to put his trust and confidence in him, to be obedient vnto him, to inuoke & call vpon his name, and to acknowledge and confesse that all goodnes proceedeth from him, & by that meanes to glorifie him in all his actions. And since the fall of man, God hath giuen him a greater and more ample knowledge of his glory, and hath further obliged him to acknowledge & magnifie him, by the benefit of the redemption of mankind, accomplished in Iesus Christ, and of the regeneration of all the faithfull (the most happy fruit of the high misteries of our salvation) for in that Christ is called the image of the inuisible God, and that he was giuen by the Father, to the end, that whoeuer beleueeth in him, shal not perish, but shall haue life euerlasting; that in his sacrifice he vanquished and overcame the deuill, sinne, death, and hell. I say, wee may know and liuely feeble the wisdom, the holinesse, the righteousness, the mercie, the goodnesse, the loue, the truth, and the power of God (Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost) that wee might loue him, put our whole trust and confidence in him, cleave vnto him, feare him, pray vnto him, and acknowledge him to bee the overflowing spring and fountaine of all goodnesse. And thereby to obtaine our last and principall end afore said. For in all these great mysteries of the workes of our saluation, consisteth the meanes, by the which beeing withdrawn from death and eternall damnation, wee are made the children of God by Iesus Christ (God made man) and heires of his kingdom and glorie.

3. Three principall ends of the life of man.

By good right then, wee say it is great folly in man, not to know wherefore hee liueth, and yet this grosse ignorance is much more common then it is thought to be. For of this sort, are all those that thinke to liue for themselves; as Artificers to nourish their families, Marchants to enrich themselves, Courtiers and Captaines to make themselves great, and to attaine to high estates and honours: and others (worse then brute beastes) to giue themselves to all delights and worldly pleasures: and to bee short, all those in generall, that thinke they liue in the world, to accommodate themselves therein with all things that flesh and blood lusteth after, and desireth. Wherein experience more then evidently sheweth, that there is not almost any man, that knoweth wherefore hee liueth, or at least, that applyeth not his actions to an other speciall and principall ende, then that for the which hee ought to liue: which is a most pernicious error, and full of ingratitude. For as all other creatures made for the vse of man, continually do bend all their actions to that ende and purpose whereunto they are ordained, that is, to serue man, by furnishing him with that which is necessarie for him. Man onely knowing not wherefore he liueth, turneth the ende of his saluation vpside downeward, attributing his essence, his life, his feeling, and his vnderstanding to himselfe. And yet hee seeth evidently, that no other thing is created for it selfe, but to serue an other (as wee said before.) Neuerthelesse, hee beeing onely endowed with reason and vnderstanding, is so foolish, as to beleue, that hee is not created for the seruice of an other greater then hee, but onely for himselfe.

Now to make vs wiser, and better aduised, let vs learne by the holy Scriptures, that to obtaine both the one and the other end (first and last) of our creation; There are three speciall ends and purposes, whereunto wee ought to direct the course of our liues. The first, to glorifie God. The second, to attaine to eternall life. And the third, every man to apply all his actions in his particular vocation, to the seruice of God. And as the knowledge of our God, is requisite and necessarie for vs, to frame our mindes to that spirituall wisdom; so that wherein wee ought specially and principally to exercise and employ our selues, is to acknowledge God, that by knowing him, we may bend all the course of our liues to those three poynts, whereof wee intend to speake. For the first and principallest of them, which is to glorifie God, it consisteth heerein, that wee confesse with our mouthes, and shew by our workes, that wee esteeme and account of him in our hearts, to be the same that he is, and that he sheweth himselfe to be towards vs, as wee are taught by Saint Peter, speaking to all the faithfull in these wordes, Yee are a chosen generation, a royall Priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people, that yee should shewe forth the vertues of him, that hath called you out of darknesse, into his marueilous light. Now the vertues of our God are, that hee is a God most puissant, most good, most wise, most mercifull, most holy, most iust, and most true. Whereunto that hath reference, which David (exhorting all men to praise God, adding a reason) saith, For his louing kindnes is great towards vs, and the truth of the Lord endureth for ever. Therefore in these foure points also, we giue him that glory, & yeeld him that seruice which we owe vnto him, that is, in putting all our confidence in him, in obeying him according to his wil, in calling vpon him in all our necessities, & in acknowledging al good things to proceed & come from him. Thus you see in few words what the first end & purpose of our life ought to be. The second which tendeth to eternall life, is, seeing that God hath sent his son into the world, that the world might be saued by him, & that whosoever beleueth in him, should not be condemned; it appeareth evidently, that as the end of our redemption, accomplished in Iesus Christ, is to saue the elect: so we that beleue in him, ought to haue this speciall intent & purpose in all the course of our liues, to be saued by him, otherwise it is as much as in vs lieth, to overthrow the excellent & admirable work of our redemption. God hath created man without comparifon, more excellent then the brute beast. Neuertheles, if man doth not attaine to an other other life but onely terrestriall, he is more miserable then the brute beast, which passing this terrestriall life, with lesse paine and trouble then man, feeleth no euill nor torment at all being dead. To the contrary, those that haue not this intent, and firme, and certaine assurance to obtaine eternall life, hauing endured diuers calamities, and many corporall, and spirituall afflictions in this world, when they die goe into hell, there to suffer and endure incomprehensible and infinite torments. Therefore it is, that the precepts and instructions of the holy Scriptures, which tend to the grounding and establishing of our faith, doe not promise vs pleasures, and delights in this world, nor yet honours, riches, nor other commodities of the flesh, whereunto vaine and foolish men aspire, but to the contrary, much labour, paine, and trauell. And to be short, a life full of trouble and anguish: which being lightly and soone past ouer, hath for reward, a heauenly and eternall life. Whereunto Iesus Christs owne words tend, saying, Blessed are the poore in spirit, (who being vtterly void of all fond opinion, and trust in themselves, put their hope only in the mercie of God) for theirs is the kingdome of heauen. Blessed are they that mourne, (feeling their owne miserie, and therein seeke remedie in God) for they shall bee comforted. Blessed are the meeke (which are ready, rather to suffer all things, then to be reuenged) for they shall inherite the earth. That is, in assurance, and peace of conscience, vnder the protection of God. The Lord also, calleth all those happie that are pure in heart, which hunger and thirst for righteousness; which are mercifull, which are peace makers, and which suffer persecution for righteousness sake: for (saith he) theirs is the kingdome of heauen, and they shall see God. This then is the end: the soueraigne good, the ioy and the felicitie, whereunto our great Law-giuer and Saviour, will haue vs aspire, and which wee hope by his grace to attaine vnto, and whereof Saint Paul making mention, cryeth out, and saith, (The things which eye hath not seene, neither eare hath heard, neither came into mans heart, are those which God hath prepared for them, that loue him. Now when a man hath a iourney to make, and is loth to goe out of his way, it is necessarie for him to know whether he goeth, and to whom hee goeth, to the which end we haue both the one and the other, in Iesus Christ, very God and very man. For in that he is God, and consequently life, it is to him that we must goe: and in that he is man, it is by him that we haue access vnto God, and are vnited vnto him, thereby to enioy eternall life. Therefore it is said of Christ, That he is the way, the truth, and the life. Touching the third end and purpose whereunto we ought to bend the course of our liues, and which consisteth in every one of our particular vocations, it is certaine, that it is not our owne profite, honour, or aduantage, and carnall contentment alone, that we must seeke for, but that also of our neighbours, (that is all men) for that in seruing them, we serue God. Our most puissant Creator and Redeemer could if it pleased him, preserue our bodies, and saue our soules without the ministrie of man. But he doth vs the honour to accomplish his worke by vs. Therefore that there might be bread to nourish our bodies, he hath by his providence ordained that there should be husband men to till the earth, millers, and bakers: To furnish vs with clothes and apparell, shepheards, shearers, combers, spinners and wea- uers of wooll, Fullers, Diers, and Tailors: To build and make vs houses, Carpenters, Masons, and Bricklayers: and to be short, Artificers, and Merchants of all trades and merchandise, to furnish and provide that which is necessarie for mans body. As also hee hath ordained Kings, Princes, and Magistrates, that by their authoritie, every man should bee compelled to follow their vocations vprightly: and that they should exercise and execute the charge committed vnto them, to preserue and defend the good, and to punish the wicked. Hee hath also giuen, and doth giue, and ordaine Pastours, Doctors, and Ministers of his Word, To saue (as Saint Paul saith) those that heare them: illuminating, planting faith in them, and forming them to his obedience, by the ministrie of the Gospel. In this manner, God effecteth, and perfecteth his worke, and his will, to bee protector and preseruer of our bodies, and Saviour of our soules, employing men in his seruice, every one according to his estate & condition. For very slaues and seruants serue God, Doing seruice to their Masters, (as the Apostle witnesseth) wherein specially we haue a singular consolation & comfort for all persons, called vnto, and exercising most base and vile vocations, and which seem abiects & contemptible in the sight of the world, for if we consider that therein seruing man, we serue God, no state nor condition can be dishonourable. For his Maiesty is so great, that there can be no base nor vile estate in his house. Now all the earth is the palace of his glory, and before him being infinite, there is nothing great nor little, more nor lesse, neere nor farre: those things are markes and euident signes of finitie and imperfection:

In such manner that there is nothing so vile, but as the creature of God, it serueth to his glory; nothing so small, but hee vseth it for great matters; and nothing so great, but hee maketh it bow and bend vnder the least things. So that if a poore maide Seruant that sweepeth a house, and doth other abiect workes, shall remember, and thinke with her selfe, that the Lord of all men, hath called her to that state and condition, and that seruing her Master and Mistresse, shee serueth the Soueraigne Master of the world, it will bee a contentment, and an assurance vnto her of a reward (without comparison) greater then that which she expecteth at mortal mens hands. For as God is great, yea, and infinite; so he esteemes much the seruice that is done vnto him. And his children are so deere vnto him that for the seruice that they do vnto man, he will not only recompence them, with a meere temporall reward, but also, (because therein they serue him) he will haue them to attend and hope for a reward from him, that is, life eternall. To that end also Saint Paul saith, That the woman shall be saved, through bearing of children, if she continue in faith, loue, and holines, with modesty. For it is true, that the woman bearing her child in her wombe, bringing it forth and nourishing it, endureth much paine, great griefe, and exceeding trouble, but if she thinketh and remembreth that God (who will haue the world preserved, and continued by generation) hath called her to that state and condition, and that her ende, purpose, and intent is, in all those seruices, that shee doth to her child, how vile and base soeuer, to serue God, doing the duty of a mother: let her be of good comfort, and seruing God in that manner shee shall bee saved, and shall receiue the great reward and guerdon of the heavenly inheritance.

4. Conclusion of this Chapter.

By that which is sayd, it evidently appeareth, how dangerous & pernicious this folly is, not to know wherefore we liue, and that it is a most necessary wisdom an instruction for a man to know himselfe well, and the end wherefore he was borne. And therefore we must learne, that the principall end of our life should be to encrease more and more in the knowledge of God, that in knowing him, we may glorifie him, and obtaine vnto our selues, eternall life: wherein consisteth our onely soueraigne good. And further, that every one in his particular vocation, should bend his mind to serue God, in seruing men, whereby wee shall be induced to walke before him, in a good conscience; and as those that are bound to yeeld an accompt vnto him of al our actions, and not as before men, to please them or to get and reap vnto our selues, humane profits and commodities. If we liue in this manner, we shall bee in the way to heauen, which the effect and meaning of the diuine law of God teacheth vs, that is; to loue God, with all our hearts, and our neighbour (in God, and for the loue of God,) as our selues.

That man ought to deliuer himselfe from the fift folly, which is, To iudge of the happy or unhappy state of man, by exterior signes. Chap. 6.

1. The children of God are inclined to stumble at his providence, and wise and iust conduction of men to their endes.

THe fift principall folly by vs set downe, is, to iudge of the happy or unhappy state of man by exterior signes, which folly is the rather to be noted, because it is very common, not onely among irreligious, and all sorts of prophane people, but also among the children of God, and so much the rather to be reiected, because it is most pernicious. Against this stone the wisest men haue stumbled, and therewith pusht at the diuine providence of God, wherein is comprehended, his goodnes, his wisdom, and his iustice, which specially appeare in the wise and iust conduction of man vnto his ende. The great Prophet Dauid confesseth, that he was possessed with the same folly, (esteeming wicked men) because of their prosperity) to be happy; and to the contrarie, those that walked in piety, and godlinesse, and dranke vp affliction like water abundantly, to be unhappy, and acknowledged that he was so much troubled to think thereon, that his feet were ready to set forward to ioine in league with the peruerse and wicked: that he thought that there was no prouidence in God: and that it was but lost labour, and in vaine, to seeke to serue him holily and vprightly. But after

after that, againe he saith, That it was a great stupiditie in him, that he was foolish and ignorant, and knew nothing, and that he was a beast before God. Jeremy touched with the like error, entred into disputation with God, Why the wicked prospered, and to the contrary, Good men were afflicted? In like sort Iob saith, I am afraid, and feare taketh holde on my flesh, wherefore doe the wicked live, and waxe olde, and grow in wealth? How many times doth David complaine, looking vpon the outward shew of his afflicted estate, as if he were forsaken and abandoned of God, as if he had forgotten him, as if hee were angry with his seruant, and as if he had withdrawne his grace and mercy from him? So the Church of Israel considering her affliction, entred into an opinion, and complaining that God had forgotten and abandoned her? To be short, it is the nature of all men to stand vpon exterior things, & to iudge them to be happy, that prosper according to the world & the flesh, and that escape the paines & punishments that they deserue: and those vnhappy, that are afflicted, and endure pouerty, & oftentimes shame & punishment, which they deserued not:

To preserve and deliuer vs from this folly, first wee must resolve vpon this point, that it is not requisite, nor any reason, that we poore wormes of the earth should know & vnderstand the counsell of God, nor the resorts, causes and circumstances of his will and diuine providence: for if it were so, then he should no more be God, or we should no more be men. Much lesse reason is it for him to subiect the iust & wise conduction of his creatures, to the rules of our senses, & corrupt iudgements. For as there is nothing so cleare, nor so easie, as to beleue & acknowledge a God, nor nothing so difficult, as to know what hee is, so we are constrained to beleue a most great & soueraigne providence, which presedeth ouer all, and governeth the world generally & particularly: but to vnderstand the causes, moving & measure thereof, as it is not requisite nor reasonable, so it is altogether impossible. A Pagan saith very well, that mans vnderstanding, is as fit and proper to comprehend celestiall and diuine things, as the eyes of a Bat, to see the light & brightnes of the Sun. And seeing that kings & princes, as much as they can, keepe their counsels, secret and vnknown to the vulgar sort, esteeming it a sure rampier and defence to their authority, and good government; we are thereby to learne, not to be abashed, nor astonished, that we cannot vnderstand, nor penetrate into, the eternall deliberations, determinations and profound iudgements, which the king of kings holdeth, & are past in the secret consistory of his infallible providence. Then let it suffice vs to know, that God governeth & ruleth ouer all, as the Master and Lord of all things, and that he knoweth how to vse, and to dispose of them all, for the best. Now in the question which is in hand, we must note, that therein our iudgement is erroneous, proceeding from an other folly and abuse, which is, that it seemeth vnto vs, that riches, honors, greatnesse, health, delights, aboundance, and a long prosperous and a happy worldly life, are good things: and to the contrary, pouerty, contempt, abiectnes, sicknesse, discommodities of the flesh, & a short (and in the end) a miserable life, are great euils. From whence we draw this consequence, that by them we haue euident testimonies of the wrath & anger of God against men, and of his fauour and blessings towards them. But therein we reckon amisse, and make a false supposition. For neither riches, nor any other the like things which are pleasing to flesh and bloud, are properly and truly good, no more then pouerty, abiectnes, & the like (which the world abhorreth) are euil, neither can bee termed so, but falsely, & vnproperly, vntill that in saying so, we make this distinction, that they are good or euil, external, counterfeit, transitory, false, fraile, and corruptible things. Now all such good and euil things, are common to euery man, and both the good and the bad haue part therein in differently. And by them also, man can neither be good nor wicked, so farre forth, as they touch not the principall part, which is the soule, nor penetrate to the quick, but only stay at the outward barke or huske. They may be occasions and instruments of good, or of euil, as the person that they meet withal is affected, as when a mans stomacke or his body, is sicke or whole, the meat that he eateth changeth either into good nourishment, or into offensive humors. For to an honest man, riches, & other commodities, & worldly advantages, are helps to do good, & profitable means vnto him, to exercise vertue, & so is pouerty & affliction, because riches make exploits in great matters easie, & pouertie & aduersitie by their sharpenes, & difficulties, do therunto adde more praise, comendation, & worth, & prouoke, & stir up the courages & minds of honest men. Where on the other side, they are as many occasions, and instruments to the wicked to make them worse & more disordered by riches to commit insolencies, and violences, and by pouertie to despaire, and to enterprise all vnlawfull actions; otherwise, nothing can hurt man, nor take any thing from him, no not death, what shew soeuer it makes, as hereafter wee will more at large declare. For all such good and euill things are superficiall and exterior. But the true, interior, and substantiall good things, proper to the children of God, are piety, vertue, innocency, ioy, tranquillitie of spirit, peace of conscience, and contentment. As on the other side, the right and true euils, proper to the children of the diuell are impiety, superstition, vice, trouble, couetous affections, dishonest desires, anguish of the spirit, horror of conscience, and perpetuall disquietnesse.

3. No exterior thing can make man happy or unhappy.

The speciall and principall reason that maketh vs iudge falsely of the happy or unhappy state of man, is, because wee thinke and suppose, that there is no fauour, grace, blessing, nor felicity but onely in honours, dignities, riches, and other commodities pleasing and agreeable to flesh and bloud: which makes wicked men flatter with themselves, and to be hardened in their iniquities. As Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicile, who after hee had forcibly taken, and carried away the gold and ornaments of the Temple; being at Sea, with a prosperous winde, said, Now you see that the immortall Gods fauour Sacriledge. And the Prophet Malachi, attributeth the like blasphemies to the wicked in his time, that said, It is in vaine to serue God, and what profit is it, that we haue kept his Commandements, and that wee walked humbly before the Lord of Hosts? Therefore wee count the proud blessed, even they that worke wickednesse are set up, and they that tempted God, are deliuered. From whence it cometh that many that suppose themselves to be honest men, doe follow the common traine of others, that they may bee aduanced to high estates, and greatnesse in the world, by corrupt meanes, or giue themselves to vnlawfull trades, fraudes, deceites, and other iniquities, because they imagine, that such as abound in riches, and possesse great dignities at their pleasures, are happier then they, that walking vprightly and iustly, are bale, contemned, poore and afflicted. The reason hereof is, because we are short of sight, and haue our eies so dazeled, with the bright shew of humane vanities, that wee cannot pierce through exterior prosperity, vnder the vaile thereof to see iniquity, which cannot but be accursed of God, and produce euill, with what colour soeuer it is cloaked or couered. Wee perceiue nothing but that which glistereth superficially, both in pouertie and riches. We see the clothes, and not the body, or rather the body and not the soule, the exterior worke, and not the workeman. The Prophet saith, Happie is the man that doth not walke in the counsell of the wicked, nor stand in the way of sinners, nor sit in the seat of the scornfull. This is easily beleeued, if wee behold those wicked sinners, mockers, and scornors, either vpon a scaffold, or a ladder ready to be executed to death, or cast into hell.

But when wee consider them clothed with riches, endowed with honors, and reioicing in their pleasures and humane prosperities, then wee easily alter our opinions, and casting oure eyes vpon the apparell, pleasing and delightfull to the flesh, wee esteeme them happie, and forget Dauids counsell, That wee cannot bee happy, but by abhorring the actions and wayes of wicked men. And so wee resemble those, who beholding a man laid in a rich and sumptuous bed, serued with delicate fare, and musicke playing before him, esteeme him happy: and hee to the contrary, feeling intollerable paine of the gowt, or of the collicke, or other diseases, which make him lie in his bed, complaineth miserably. Let vs know then, that God oftentimes giueth not exterior blessings to his children, and that for good causes, and for their profites, and many times suffereth those goods that they haue, to bee forcibly taken away from them by theeues and wicked persons. For the which if they complaine, they doe vniustly; and if therefore they esteeme and thinke themselves to bee more miserable, it is blasphemy against Gods prouidence. For touching the first, there is no reason why wee should complaine, because we haue not riches, or because we lose that which wee may well be without, and without the which we may liue well, happily and contentedly if wee will: as also that without them wee came into the world, and shall die, and leaue them behind vs. They are none of ours, and that which we need is not much, and we may easily obtaine it. Doe wee see many men die or perish for want of a gowne, or of bread? Why should we desire more, vnlesse it be to torment, to shame, and to condemne our owne weak and fraile desires? and that which may hurt, corrupt, and spoyle vs, and which hath ouerthrowne ouerthrowen many, who before living privately vnder the discipline of pouertie, were honest men. Are we bereft of that, which so many notable parsonages despised, and willingly forsooke, as hurtfull burthens, and hinderances vnto them from good actions? Wee are by that meanes rather much more assured, & protected from euill. That which we thinke to bee hurtfull and losse vnto vs, is rather our profit, and a meanes for vs to shunne a greater misery. For the second point, why should we take God? wherein is he bound, or obliged vnto vs? But why doe wee not rather thinke well of him, and thanke him, because hee doeth thereby lighten our shippe, by throwing so heauie and burthensome a fardell ouer boord, lest wee should sinke and bee cast away? Because I say, hee taketh care of vs, as the Physician of our soules, which he hath made, and knoweth well, and in that for our saluation, he giueth vs such a purgation, diet, and restraint? For with the one hand taking from vs the shady hard crust of exterior blessings, with the other he giueth vs the substance and solid truth of interior riches, filling vs inwardly with ioy, rest, and contentment, which cannot bee bought with all the goods in the world. This peace of conscience is the true health, the true riches, and the true good of man; a giift of God vnto his elect, and a singular effect of his diuine providence.

But all those humane things which fooles so much admire and esteeme, are like a little winde, ora dreame, vanishing like smoake, dissoluing like scomme, passing away like a shadowe, and to bee short, hauing no firmnesse nor assurance. Therefore wee must no more trust in them, nor desire them, then reioyce when wee haue gotten them, or bee sorrowfull when they leaue vs. And certainly, as hee is neere vnto, and resembleth God, that hath a contented minde, and hath no need of any thing, (for what other thing is it to be God, but that) so hee onely is worthy of the Deitie, that can despise and abandon all things: that is not God. Wee must also iudge the like of all the afflictions, and crosses that happen to honest men, as banishments, proscriptions, ignominies, opprobies, vniust condemnations, premeditated, vntimely, violent and shamefull deaths. For although such disgraces much dislike vs, and oftentimes vex our soules: neuertheless, wee must not vnadvisedly, or rashly iudge of those things, but take leasure to thinke vpon them, and call to minde how many wayes they are and may bee profitable and commodious vnto vs.

It is certaine, that harsh and hard afflictions serue especially for a true and an assured meanes to make a man known to others, but much better to himselfe. What knoweth he, or what can hee assure or promise to himselfe that neuer was tried, that neuer entred into the lists of tribulation, that neuer suffered any thing, or neuer incurred any disgrace? Prosperitie is a maske, a faire curtaine, and a deceiifull vaile, which disguiseth, and couereth the truth of things, and which sleaeth and hideth our selues from our selues. But aduersitie sheweth things openly and plainely, till that hapneth all is but colourable, & a faire outward shew. To the good, & such as professe godlines, crosses, & troubles, are the true & only means to exercise the, & to refine & confirm their vertue, which otherwise, would languish, slacken, & lose their strength, and vtterly become weak, and withered. A Pagan was wont to say, that there is nothing more miserable in this world then hee who neuer felt any kinde of aduersity; because (saith he) that such a man hath no occasion to make prooue of himselfe; as long as all things fall out according to his desire: adding farther, that the gods had an euill opinion of him, because they thought him vnworthy once in his life to vanquish and overcome fortune. And shall wee that are Christians, bee ignorant and not know, that by afflictions God proueth, exerciseth, and hardneth to endure all paine, those whom hee loveth, and by discipline prepareth and maketh them better, notabler, excellenter & perfecter; that so they may attaine to the highest degree, of the rewards and recompences, which by his free mercy and gracious goodnes, he hath prepared for them in heauen. For tribulation is a medicine, & a proper remedy against all euil, that might corrupt & infect vs. In tract of time & with long prosperity we may forget our selues & become degenerate, & adulterate. But aduersity hold vs down, breatheth, purifieth, & clenseth our soules from the rustines of sin, & thereby retaineth & containeth vs within the bounds of feare & obediēce. The thing which most grieveth our hearts at the first, & seems troublesome to digest it, is that which we said before, touching vntimely death, specially when it is violent & shameful, but let vs call to mind & remember, that death is a debt which we must pay, and a comon path way, which every man must tread, & go through. That death is not a paine, but naturall to man, & that he came into the world, to go out of it again. That the law of nations requireth, that every man shall restore that which he hath receiued. That our life is but a short pilgrimage, which we haſſe to an end every day, to attaine to heauen which is our cuntry: and that if we die young. Death it may be deliuereth vs from ſome great euill, at the leaſt, from that which old age bringeth with it, then what ſkilts it, when, or in what manner we pay that tribute, or paſſe that way, ſoone or late, in our chambers or in our beds, in battaile, or in a publique place, by water or by land, ſpecially when ſeruing God in our vocation, and with a good conſcience, wee yeeld our ſoule vnto him. Pſal. 116. 15 Precious in the ſight of the Lord (ſaith Dauid) is the death of his Saints. Howſoeuer, then it cometh to paſſe, diuine providence directing all things to a good end, doth all for the beſt to thoſe that loue him, both publickely and privately. King Iofias (a Prince of whom the Scripture ſaith, he neuer had his like, and whoſe nativity had bene prophesied ſo many yeeres before, together with all his actions) died in the flower of his age, among the darts and arrowes of his enemies, bewailed of all the people, and bitterly lamented by the Prophet Jeremie, that compoſed his lamentations in forme of mornefull ditties, to be read and ſung in honor of him. Who is ſo dull of vnderſtanding, that will eſteeme Iofias leſſe happie for his vntimely death. It is a generall rule, and a vniuerſall iudgement, that to let a thing reſt in it ſelfe, and in his inſeparable nature, vntill it cometh and attaineth to the naturall end, it will be the vtter ruine thereof: and that the meanes to preferue and lengthen the eſſence, uſe, and profite thereof, is to anticipate or prevent the end of it. If your ſpare and leaue flowers and fruits ſtill vpon a tree, or on their ſtalkes, in the aire, they will wither, rotte and dry. To make them liue long, and to giue them, as it were, an other eſſence, and a better and longer life, you muſt plucke, gather and preferue them, and as we properly ſay conſerue them. How many men haue bin ſeen and knowne to haue gotten and obtained a good reputation, beeing young, but when they came to age loſt it againe: how many haue ſcene their labors and conqueſts die before them? and how many haue overliued their glory? for which cauſe their friends ſaid, that it had bene better and more expedient for their honors, that they had died tenne yeere before. Now God all wiſe, that knoweth good men, and that hath made them ſuch as they are, and therefore loueth them, knoweth well, and how far it is good both for them and for the common good, that they ſhall liue. Wherefore, although he may, and can by good right aſke their liues of them againe, at all times when he will, without doing them any wrong, he aſketh it againe, at ſuch time and ſeaſon, and taketh it away in ſuch manner, as is fit both for them, and for the world to looſe it. Their death is a ſowing and an obtaining of a better life, and if it be ſpeedily, it is done to put them the ſooner in poſſeſſion of the inheritance of heauen. And againe, if death be ſhamefull to the world, it is to make it more honorable, & notable before the angels, if it be violent and cruell, then it is richer, worthier, and of more efficacy, and recommendation, and a ſweete and perpetuall odour to the poſterity. It is a precious crowne and a moſt faire conſequence of their liues, a preferuation of honor for them, and a notable patterne and model for others, of all which benefits, both they and others had bene deprived, if they had died in other manner. Thoſe to whom ſuch an end hath hapned, it is the faireſt, richeſt and the laſt and beſt action that euer they did.

There was neuer any thing performed nor done in the liues of Socrates, Phocius, Seneca, Regulus, Pamphilian: no nor in the life of Ieſus Chriſt himſelfe, nor of the Martyrs (that is to ſay, of all the great perſonages that euer liued) that was comparable to their deathes, which hindreth them from dying, and makes them liue for euer. To bee ſhort, our God is ſo good and ſo puiſſant, that he maketh Treacle of poiſon, and conuerteth death into life.

4. The conſequence of this Chapter.

To conclude, wee muſt bee reſolute, and fully reſolved herein, that death, exile, teares, griefe, and ſuch like things, are no puniſhments nor euils; but rather quit rents, reuenues, and tributes impoſed vpon our liues. Then it is euident and plaine, how great and pernicious this folly is, to iudge of the happie and vnhappie ſtate of man by exterior things, it being moſt true, that ſuch a fooliſh opinion, aboliſheth faith, hope, and affection in vs, to walke in the feare of God, as alſo his providence. To amend our liues in this poynt, wee muſt iudgement to be happy or vnhappy, according to the certaine and inſallible teſtimonies of the word of God, firmly beleeuing this ſentence by him pronounced. Say yee, Eſay 3. 10. 11 Surely it ſhall bee well with the iuſt: for they ſhall eate the fruite of their workes: woe bee to the wicked, it ſhall bee euill with him, for the reward of his hands ſhall bee giuen him. Reſting vpon this ſpirituall wiſedome, which onely knoweth both the exterior and interior, things preſent, and and things to come, wee will conclude against the false iudgement of the world and of the flesh, that the wicked although they that prosper, are miserable and vnhappy, and that good men feare God, and haue their confidence and hope in his grace, and mercie, what aduersities and tribulations soeuer they suffer and endure, are alwaies happy. Whereby wee shall reape this benefit, that as the contrary opinion serueth in a manner for chaines and strong cables in the hands of Sathan, therewith to drawe and prouoke men to liue wickedly and prophanely: so for our parts, (by that which hath bin said before) we shalbe able to breake and rent in tunder, those wicked cords, and be encouraged to perseuer in holinesse and righteousness of life, knowing, that our labour shall not be in vaine before the Lord.

That it is necessary for vs to leaue the sixth folly, which is to giue more credit to our enemies, then to our friends. Chap. 7.

1. Man is naturally inclined to credit and beleene three great enemies.

We reade in Ecclesiastes this notable aduertisement, saying, Aske no counsell of religion, of a man that is without religion; nor of iustice, of him that hath no iustice; nor of a woman touching her of Eccles. 37. 12. whom shee is ielous; nor of a coward, of matters of warre; nor of a Marchant, concerning exchange; nor of the buyer for the sale; nor of an enuious man touching thankesfulnesse; nor of the vnmerefull, touching kindnesse; nor of an vnhonest man, of honestie; nor of the slothfull, for any labour; nor of an hireling, for the finishing of a worke; nor of an idle seruant, for much businesse: hearken not vnto these in any manner of counsell. Now if it be a folly to beleue the aduice and counsell of a man, not so much an enemy vnto vs, as a friend vnto himselfe, in that wherein hee may haue any consideration, and respect of his owne person and actions. It is a much greater and vnexcusable folly to beleue and to giue credit to the counsell of our enemies, which onely seeke and pretend our vtter ruine and decay. A certaine wise man saith, That as the industrious Bees, out of the bitter herbe Time, sucke and gather the most sweet and driest hony: so a wise, provident, and vertuous man, knowes how to draw profit and commoditie from his enemies. But that is not, by beleeuing them, but rather by being wary and fearefull to faile and erre in his vocation, and more earnest industrious, and diligent, to mannage his actions wisely, and to reforme the imperfections, whereunto he findeth himselfe inclined: being well assured, that an enemy is like a spy towards him whom hee hateth, and ready to publish and make knowne, what imperfection or vice soeuer he finderh to be in him. But the question here, is not of any such, but rather of three principall enemies, which are so much the more dangerous, as they are either in vs or about vs, and which is worse, whom naturally wee are much enclined to beleue. The first is, the loue of our selues, (or as the Scripture commonly calleth it,) of our flesh; and the concupiscences thereof; The second the world: and the third the diuell.

2. The flesh and the concupiscences thereof, the first, and a great enemy to man.

Man is borne with a disordered, and a kind of blinde loue of himselfe, which maketh him inclined, and thrusteth him forward to consent vnto the desires and affections of his heart, so much corrupted by sinne which dwelleth in him, that he can produce and bring forth nothing but wicked concupiscences, which only tend vnto euil, & are aduersaries and enemies that lodge within his body, that seeke to seduce him, and that continually fight and strue against his saluation. For which cause Saint Paul aduertiseth all the faithfull to call Eph. 4. 22. of the old man, that is corrupt, through deceivable lusts; & S. Peter willet vs to abstaine I. Pet. 2. 11. from carnall desires, which war against the Soule. Our flesh is a most dangerous and pernicious enemy. For as Saint Paul saith, The wisdom of the flesh is death and enmitie against God, Rom. 8. 6, 7, 8. whom they that are in the flesh cannot please. For which cause Saint Iames compareth concupiscence to a wicked mother, conceiuing and bringing forth sinne, and consequently death of the soule to eternall damnation. For (as the Apostle saith in another place) the wages of sinne is death, but the gift of God is eternall life, through Iesus Christ our Lord. Whereupon also he exhorteth the Romanes, that sinne should not raigne in their mortall bodies, to obey it it in the lusts thereof. Neuerthelesse, wee are so foolish and sencelesse, to hearken vnto, and to beleue our flesh more then God; whose loue towards vs, is certaine and incomprehensible. But what are the counsels of the flesh, but only to couet and desire those false riches, whereof wee will speake heereafter, to get and obtaine wealth, by what meanes soeuer wee can, to aspire to honors and dignities of the world, to excell others therein, and to followe pleasures, delights, and other such like affections. When in the meane time we know, that God condemneth all such wicked and damnable counselles; declaring and shewing by his holy word, That the root of all euils, is couetousnesse and desire of riches, which maketh men fall into diuers temptations and snares; by many foolish and hurtfull thoughts, which bring them to misery, and vtter destruction: That it is not the doctie of Christians to be couetous of vaine glory: That whosoever shall exalt himselfe, shall be brought low: That whosoever will be great and chiefe among vs, shall be our seruant: That it is he that scattereth the proude in the imagination of their hearts: That loue is not enuious, loue doeth not boast it selfe, loue is not puffed vp: That the pleasures of this world hinder and let a man from reaping any fruite by the word of God: That it is the Lord that will iudge fornicators, and adulterers. And to bee short, the holy Ghost admonisheth vs, throughout the whole Scriptures, to mortifie our flesh, to cast it off, to renounce it, and all the desires thereof, as an enemy that counsellet vs to doe that which is euill.

Now if every one will examine his owne conscience, and looke into the ordinary and common course of man: Iudgement will soone bee giuen, and resolved vpon, that all men in generall haue a desire to enrich themselves, to become great, and of higher authoritie then others, that they enuy those which exceed them in such vanities: that they hunt after carnall pleasures and delights of the flesh, and that they rather and sooner beleue the counsell of the flesh, then of God. Experience sheweth it too manifestly, and the onely example and open confession of S. Augustine, a man endowed with great pietie and holinesse, shall serue to ouerthrow and conuince vs therein, who speaking of couetousnesse, ambition, pride, pleasures, and other concupiscences, and affections of the flesh: saith, I haue an army of traytors within me, who vnder pretence and shadow of friendship, are mine enemies, neuerthelesse, they are the same, with whom I haue liued from my youth vpwards, whom I haue sought to please, and whom I haue beleued: These are the friends whom I cherished, and made much of; the masters to whom I obeyed, the Lords whom I serued, the domestick neighbours among whom I dwelt, and the counsellors in whom I put my whole trust and confidence.

3. The world an other great enemy to man.

Our second great enemy, whom wee too lightly and too soone beleue, is the world, not the beautifull and great frame of the vniuersall globe, whereof the diuinitie, order, and equall firmenesse of all the seuerall parts, together with one perfect harmony, obeying the gracious and soueraigne gouernment of their Creator, by good right deserue to bee called pure, for without so excellent a disposition, there would be nothing els but an vnclane, and polluted disorder and confusion. For the world so taken & expounded, signifieth no other thing, but an ornament, or an order of things well disposed and set together. But to the contrary, in this place, as we meane & vnderstand the world, and according to the ordinary stile of the holy Scriptures, it is the corruption and vniuersall disorder found to bee in all men, who commonly and by nature, addict themselves to euill, staying and setting their thoughts and imaginations vpon this present life, little thinking vpon, nor caring for the kingdome of heauen. As Saint Paul calleth the world euill. And Saint Iohn saith, that all the world lyeth in wickednes: whereof he propounds certaine examples, saying, for that which is in the world, that is, the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eies, and the pride of life, is not of our heavenly Father. For by the lusts of the flesh, hee vnderstandeth, a desire to liue delicately at our ease, with all terrestriall commodities; by the lusts of the eies, the vanities of vnchast lookes, braueries, pomps, and other superfluities; and by the pride of life, ambition, pride, vaine confidence, and loue of our selues, alwaies ioyned with the despising of others. This kinde of world is our great and puissant enemy. For being so corrupt and vicious, it inuiceth, and mooueth vs, by the examples thereof, to follow it, and so to addict and abandon our selues, to the said corruptions. And we are so foolish, to beleue so great an enemy. For experience too euidently sheweth, how easily we are drawne to follow the world, and to conforme forme our selues therunto. The ease of the flesh, which some men enjoy, the pleasures and lusts wherein they delight, their riches which make them honoured, the reputation to be better then others, by great expences in banquets and sumptuous apparrell, and such like vanities, serue for a faire shew to title, moue, and entice vs to follow the train and company of worldly men. And as every man easily beleueth that which he desireth, so we without any great resistance, suffer our selues to be perswaded, to walke with the world, wherunto we are naturally inclined. It is a secret of nature, that the Adamant stone draweth Iron vnto it: But that the world draweth vs vnto it, it is as naturall a thing, as to see water run downe out of a riuer, a chariot to goe swiftly downe a hill, and when we see a man gape or yawne, to doe the like after him. For beeing all borne with sinne, which carrieth and thrusteth vs on to all corruption, wee need no aide to driue vs forward, nor much solliciting therunto: The onely sight of that which we already loue, easily pusheth and draweth vs forward. As a crafty subtil whore allureth her louer, the bayte vpon a hooke inticeth the fish, and the infectious aire, infecteth those that draw it in. To be short, it happeneth vnto vs, in this terrestriall habitation, as vnto those, who conuersing with Colliers and Millars, can hardly keepe themselves, from being blackt with coales, or whited with meale: In such manner, that we ordinarily see, that where we ought by our holy conuersation, to draw and entice such as are lewdly and worldly giuen to follow vs: to the contrary, they are stronger then we, and carry vs away with them. And whereas we ought to serue for bright shining lights, in the middle of a crooked and peruerse nation, to draw worldlings out of the darke & wrong waies, which they are in: to the pathes of light, truth, and saluation: To the contrary worldly darkenes extinguisheth our light, and maketh vs erre & wander in their obscurity. Then let vs know, that if we suffer our selues to be carried away by the inticements of the world, If we do neuer so little cast behind our backs, the care of our soules, to get and heape vp mortall and transitory riches, if we follow after vaine and prophane men of this world, addicting our minds to the delights and pleasures of the flesh, and the ordinary excesse, wherinto they willingly run: our gold, silver, costly household stufte, pleasure, pompes, vnprofitable expences, and superfluities, will be as many fooles caps, on our heads, which with a lowd voice will cry out and say, that wee are fooles indeed, so to beleue and giue credit to our enemy the world.

4. The Diuell an other great and principall enemy to man.

The third and principall enemy to man, is the diuell; whom Iesus Christ for that cause calleth the enemy, which his name of Satan also signifieth: of whom we are so many times warned in the Scriptures to beware. And to speake truth, all his counsels and policies tend to death, and the vtter destruction of mankind. And for that cause also hee is called a murderer, and an homicide from the beginning. As he shewed himselfe evidently so to be, to our first parents Adam and Eue, when vnder pretence of love and fauour towards Eue, hee perswaded her to eate of the forbidden fruite, of the tree of knowledge of good and euill: whereupon God at that time, as it were by sound of trumpet, published open warre betwene Satan and vs: The Lord himselfe saying, that he would put enmitie betweene Satan and the seed of the woman. Now sith the diuell was so bold, as to enter into terrestriall paradise to assaile and deceiue our first parents, they beeing then in the image of God: And if after that, he was so rash and so presumptuous, to follow Iesus Christ himselfe, in the deserts, and there to assaile him, tempting him forty daies and forty nights, and after that making those three powerfull assaults against him, set downe and rehearsed in the Euangelists; haue we not reason to hearken vnto that which Saint Peter saith, that this our great aduersary is, and alwaies will be, like a roaring Lyon about vs, seeking whom hee may deuoure? An enemy so much the more dangerous because he is inuisible; because hee is neuer weary of the combate; and because hee transformeth himselfe into an angell of light, thereby the easilier to seduce & deceiue vs: He presenteth vnto our eyes, (saith S. Cyprian) enticing pleasures, that by our sight, he might destroy the chastity of our harts, he tempteth our eares with the sweetnes of musicke, by our hearing to weaken the strength and force of christianity: by iniurious words, he moueth the tongue to speake euill, and by outrages, inciteth our hands to fight, and to kill man; he offereth vnlawfull gaine, to induce vs to vse fraude and deceite, and pernicious commodities, to kindle and stirre vp our soules to couetousnes tiousnes: he promisseth terrestriall honors, to bereave vs of heavenly ioy, he teacheth falsehood, to raiuish vs of the truth. To be short, he vseth a thousand kind of subtleties, in time of peace, and violence in persecutions? then what extreame folly, or rather desperate madness is it, to beleue and giue credit to such an enemy? But who is it (may some men say, that will be so ill aduise, to aske or take counsell of the Diuell? or when doth he speak to vs, know this for certain, that then he speaketh vnto vs, when he giueth or presenteth vnto vs. (but yet vnder the providence of God) Riches, honours, high estates, pleasures, delights of the flesh, prosperitie, and al things at our desires in worldly affaires. For those are the assaults of Sathā. That is the wrastring which we haue against principalities, against powers, against worldly gouernours, the princes of darkenes of this world, and against spirituall wickednes, which are in high places. To be short, those are the fiery darts of the diuell. It is true, hee presenteth not himselfe vnto vs, alwaies vnder the condition which he propounded to Iesus Christ saying, (I will giue thee all the kingdomes of the world, and the glory thereof: if thou wilt fall downe and worshipping mee.) He speakes not alwaies so plainly like a diuell. But oftentimes offereth himselfe vnto vs as a friend, to serue and accommodate vs in our wilhes and desires, yet we may easily perceiue and feele by the effects, that therewith he induceth, and mixeth certain venime and pernicious counsell, to make vs wander and stray, out of the pathes of truth & vertue, sometimes by perswading vs to dissemble with euill, and to deale therewith, to dispende with our selues in manner of liuing according to the lusts and pleasures of the world, and in practises dissenting, and far off from pietie, charitie, and true christianity, which may be veiled with the cloake of indifferencie, or of the custome and manners of the time and place, which permit vs not (as we thinke) to doe otherwise, and oftentimes incinuateth in our thoughts that simple men are not fit to liue in this world, that whosoever wil make himselfe a sheepe, shall be eaten and deuoured by wolues, and that if we liue among wolues, we must liue like wolues. This enemy both to God and man doth more and worse then this: for he maketh vs seeke after riches, to put our trust therein, to vse them in superfluities and delights, and to forget that we are mortall men. After that again, (as he knoweth how to extract venime & poyson out of al things,) he taketh away (God permitting) our goods, and makes vs poore, he afflicteth vs with long and grievous sickenes, and bringeth vs into disgrace, shame, and discredit with men, and with that kinde of proceeding, hee will seeke and goe about to perswade vs, that we haue good reason to murmur against God, to complaine of him, to forsake him, to reiect and driue him away, when he presenteth himselfe to vs in our consciences, As the Gadarens sent Christ away from among them, because they had lost their hogges, which the Diuell threw headlong into the sea and which is worse, to curse God, as the story of Iob evidently sheweth vnto vs. Further, if wee bee great sinners, our great enemy the diuell will present vnto vs, the rigor of Diuine iustice, thereby to plunge vs into despaire, and if we haue our hope and confidence in the mercy of God, he will moue and incite vs to sinne, falsely alleading, that where sin aboundeth, there grace abounded much more, and that to bee saued, there needeth no more, but to say a good peccavi, before wee die. To conclude, the temptations and allusions of the Diuell, are infinite, and he knowes too well how to put them in practise: If man will neuer so little yeeld vnto him. Neuerthelesse, let every man search and sound into his own conscience, and withal consider the common traine of men, yea and among diuers of those that make profession to know God; and they must of force yeeld and confesse themselves to bee of the number of those, that willingly heare, beleue, and too often follow the counsell of Sathan their enemy, If they wil not deny their owne workes, which are as many examples, and witnesses against them.

5. Conclusion of this Chapter.

Then let vs remember, that all such thoughts, imaginations, motions, affections, and temptations aforesaid, are the counsell of our capital enemy the Diuell. That we lodge and harbor another (as the second) with vs, and in such manner in vs, that it is as it were our selues, which is our flesh, with the concupiscences thereof. And for the third, wee haue the world, which wee loue and whereof wee desire to bee beloued, although the loue thereof is enmity against God. Therefore let vs conclude, for a truth, that it is an extreme folly, and meere madnesse in vs to beleue and giue credit to such enemies: and that to leaue our folly, and to amend our liues, wee must take better aduise, and beleue him that is our true and perfect friend. That is, our God speaking to vs in the holy Scriptures which onely containe in them certaine wholesome and saving counsels, and therefore what counsell so-euery world, the flesh, and the Deuill, shall giue vnto vs, let vs oppose the Oracles of the holy word of God against them, and with Dauid protest, That it is the light of our pathes, That the Testimonies thereof are our counsels, and that we looke to our wayes when wee obserue his word. That it is vnto vs the helmet of saluation, and the sword of the spirit, against all illusions and temptations, and to make answer with Iesus Christ, It is written, It is written. To be short, let vs practise the commandement of God, to reade and meditate his law day and night. To follow the contents thereof, and assuring our selues in his promises, we shall then conduct and guid our selues wisely, and prosper in all our wayes, and so learne how to keepe our selues from this folly, to beleue our enemies more then our friends.

That man must shunne the seventh follie: which is to thinke himselfe wise. Chap. 8.

1. It is an easie matter for a man to deceiue himselfe, in thinking to bee wise.

NOW wee are to speake of a seventh folly, which sheweth man extreemely and perfectly to be a foole, for that being spotted and defiled with the sixe great follies aforesaid, & with many more besides, yet he thinketh himselfe to be wise; shewing thereby, that there is nothing easier then for a man to deceiue and beguile himselfe: for man bearing a disordered and blindeloue to himselfe, is easily perswaded, that there is nothing in him, to be dispraised, or disliked, & therby oftentimes thinketh his ignorance to be great wisdom; in such manner, that knowing very little or nothing at all, he beleueth that he knoweth all things, and hauing no industry, nor desire to doe one good and commendable worke well, dares inconsiderately put his hand to things of greatest moment. But how much the more hee thinketh well of himselfe, so much the more hee discovereth his owne beastlinesse. If you see a hundred men walking together in the streetes, or in a common market place, yee shall not finde one among them all, but will thinke himselfe greatly injured, and will bee angrie, if you call him foole, for euery man will bee thought and esteemed to bee wise. And neuerthelesse, those that beleue not (as they should) that there is a God: That esteeme man more then God, That thinke to liue alwaies, That knowe not wherefore they liue, That iudge the happy and vnhappy state of men by exterior things, and that beleue their enemies more then their friends (for it is the common traine of all men) are not they fooles, and so much the more fooles, that they thinke themselves to bee wise: which our precedent discourses evidently prooue.

2. How men thinke themselves to be wise, and are not.

This folly to think to be wise, may yet more generally be considered, and with notable instructions in our Christian Philosophy, that is, for that men (for the most part) thinking themselves to bee created onely for their owne profit, and to serue as men in this temporall life, little, or not at all dreame or remember that they are borne Christians, to beleue as they ought in the life euerlasting, for from thence it commeth, that being wise, prudent, and well aduised touching the world, and worldly affaires, and in the meane time foolish, ignorant, and senselesse Christians touching that which concerneth heauen, and the life to come, they thinke themselves to be sufficiently wise, how foolish soeuer they bee: fooles I say, touching heauen, the principall point, and wise concerning the world; wise as touching men, and this transitorie life, but fooles concerning God, and life euerlasting. For you shall find all sorts of men that are of high and honourable estate, Iudges, Counsellors, Lawyers, Philitions, Philosophers, Gentlemen, Captaines, Merchants, Citizens, and Artificers, to bee wise and well aduised in their arts and vocations, who notwithstanding touching that which is fit for Christians to do, and whereunto God specially calleth and obligeth them, are meerely ignorant. But it is not to bee wondred at, for euery one from his youth vpwards, learneth an art, science, and occupation, to bee a wise man and expert in his state and condition, and so to be able to prouide for that which is necessarie for this present life, but there are fewe that learne the art and science truly to bee Christians and

wise and well aduised concerning things that belong to the life to come, which is to liue with God and his Angels. Experience sheweth, that a Lawyer is very wise and vnderstanding in the ciuill Lawes, and knowes how to winne his Clients cause: But oftentimes vnderstandeth little or nothing of the diuine Law, or how to defend his owne cause against the Diuell, to be iustified before God. The Physition is skilfull by art and practise to heale the diseases of the body, but thinketh not vpon the meanes how to cure the sicknesse of his owne soule. The Arethmetician, can multiply great numbers, and yet cannot learne how to reckon 70. or 80. yeares of his life, neuer remembering that it is requisite for him with David to pray vnto God, to giue him grace to keepe that accompt well, that he may apply his heart to true wisdom. The Geometrician is expert and skilfull to measure the earth, but in the meane time, hath not any vnderstanding of heauen where GOD dwelleth, nor of the way of life, which is in Christ to attaine thereunto. The Astrologian can tell how great the Sonne is, and what course it holdeth in the celestiall Spheare, but is wholly ignorant of that which the Gospell teacheth vs, concerning the Son of righteousnesse, Iesus Christ our Lord. A great many Philosophers know an infinite number of the secrets of nature, and in the meane time are wholly ignorant of the mysteries of the eternall saluation of the soule, reuealed in the holy Scriptures. The Merchant can tell how to keepe a booke of accompts, and reckonings touching marchandise, that he may thereby know what he oweth, and what is owing vnto him, but knoweth not what accompt to make vnto God of his life. A Smith knowes how to make keyes of Iron but is altogether ignorant of the keyes of the kingdome of heauen. Euery man knoweth what fruits Aple trees, Peare trees Cherry trees, and Plumbe trees beare, but few men know what fruits Christians ought to beare. To be short there are many men that are prouidēt, well aduised, and vnderstanding in worldly matters, but few Christians that are wise and well instructed in religion. But what profit is to be a wise and expert Lawyer, a Physition, a Philosopher, a Marchant, or an Artificer, and in the meane time to bee an ignorant Christian, and a misaduised foole? Let them be reputed and held to bee wise among beastes, that are not indowed with immortall soules: but among Christians, hee is so much the more foole, and sencelesse, who wisely seruing men for vaine honor and profit, and seruing God foolishly, loseth both body and soule eternally. Therefore S. Augustine, reprouing those to whom the bookes of Plato, and Aristotle were more delightfull then the holy Scriptures, calleth them fooles, as beeing people that learned a science like vnto their studies, videlicet, leaues and no fruit, that is to say, faire words, and not solid and true vertues. In this manner men thinking themselves to bee wise, (although they are partly wise in that which concerneth this present life) are fooles and sencelesse, because they vnderstand not any thing as they ought to doe, touching that which is requisite for them to knowe, thereby to obtaine eternall life.

3. Two points necessary for men to make them wise.

For that cause this common and vulger sentence, Nosce te ipsum, know thy selfe, is reputed and taken to come downe from heauen, in regard of the excellencie thereof, because it is necessarie for man to know his owne ignorance, pouertie, and myserie, that hee may thereby humble himselfe, and seeke for his owne good without himselfe, and by that meanes be led vnto God, wherein consisteth his sole felicitie. On this point dependeth the beginning, the middle, and the end of all true wisdom, nothing being more certaine, then that the knowledge of God, and of our selues, are things conioyned together; and in such maner vnited one vnto the other, by many wayes, that it cannot easily bee discerned which goeth before, and produceth the other. For first there is no Christian how little soeuer instructed in the doctrine of the holy spirit, when he beholdeth and looketh into his owne estate, but presently thinketh vpon his creator, in whom he liueth, & hath his force & essence. Because it is no difficult matter to comprehend, that the gifts and graces wherein consisteth our spirituall dignitie, proceed not by any meanes from our selues, and that our forces and abilities are nothing, vnlesse they subsist & depend on God. Consequently by the good gifts & graces, which like drops one after the other distill downe from heauen vpon vs, we are ledde as it were by little riuers, to the spring and fountaine from whence they proceed. As also, that by the small portion of good things, which wee obtaine from heauen, the infinitie of those that subsist in the Deitie, are made more apparant, together with the accursed state and condition whereinto we fell, by the revolting and sinne of our first parents. Which compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes vnto heauen, not onely to pray for, and to implore from thence the graces which we want, as to poore, needie, and defectiue persons, but also to bee moued and stirred vp, to feare the eternall God, and thereby to learne humilitie and obedience.

In this manner, by the feeling of our owne ignorance, vanitie, want, infirmitie, and folly: and which is more, our peruersitie and corruption, wee are ledde and induced to know, that in God onely consisteth and resteth the true light of wisdom, firmnesse of vertue, and certaintie of all good things, and the puritie of Iustice and Righteousnesse. From whence wee learne, that the knowledge of our selues, not onely prouoketh and inciteth euery man to know God, but also leadeth them by the hand to finde him out. On the other side, it is euident and manifest, that man neuer attaineth to the true knowledge of himselfe, vntill with the eyes of faith, he beholds the face of God, and from beholding it, looketh into the depth of his owne heart, thereby to see and consider all the secret corners of his soule. For as pride is naturally borne with vs, and deeply rooted in our hearts: so we are still of opinion, that there is much wisdom, righteousness, and holinesse in vs, vntill by manifest and euident arguments, wee are conuincd and made to see our owne ignorance, folly, iniquitie, and vncleannesse. But wee are neuer sufficiently conuincd, if we cast our eyes onely vpon our selues, and doe not presently thinke vpon God, who is the onely rule, by the which wee must order and direct this Iudgement. For seeing that wee are wholly perswaded by a foolish and an excessive kinde of loue, (which maketh vs prone and inclined to hypocrisie) to flatter with our selues, there is nothing easier vnto vs, then to content our minds more with a simple apparance of wisdom and righteousness, then with the effect and truth of Gods most exceeding vertues. For as it is true, that while wee liue heere on earth, our spirits are inclosed, and as it were bounded within the pollutions of this vncleane world, it happeneth that those things which are not altogether so disfigured and euill as others, please and content vs as well, as if they were most pure. As an eye, which neuer saw any other colour but blacke, thinketh that which is browne, or of a meane darke colour, to bee exceeding white, because it knoweth no other. But if we once begin to eleuate our thoughts to God, to meditate and thinke with our selues, how exquisite his wisdom, righteousness, and vertue is, whereunto we should be conformable, presently, that which wee so much esteemed of, vnder a vaine apparance of our owne dignitie and worthinesse, will bee vnto vs a distastefull smell and sent of our infirmitie, folly, povertie, and miserie.

And thus you see, how mutuall a coniunction there is betweene the knowledge of God, and of our selues, and that the one dependeth vpon the other. To this end that hath reference, which Iesus Christ speaking to the Pharisees, (who thinking themselves to be wise, asked him saying, Are wee blind also?) said, If you were blinde, you should not haue sinned, but now you say, wee see, therefore your sinne remaineth. For thereby the Lord would shewe, that as the beginning of repentance, is to know our selues, and confesse our owne misery and iniquitie: so to begin truly and effectually to looke into our selues, is to acknowledge that we are ignorant and fooles. As in trueth wee know nothing, if we know not Iesus Christ, that is all whatsoever maketh vs become Christians, and consequently children of God, and heires of eternall life. This is the science of all sciences, which consisteth in two points. First, in that which Saint Paul saith, That he determined to know nothing but Iesus Christ, and him crucified. Secondly, in this chiefe point of wisdom, The feare of the Lord. For by the first, we specially obtaine two things, which make a compleat Christian. The one, that in Christ, God is manifested vnto vs, Christ beeing the inuisible image of God, in whom all things both terrestriall and celestiall were created, and by him, and for him. The other, that by his blood shed vpon the crosse, we are deliuered, that is, we haue remission of sinnes, thereby to obtaine eternall life, which (saith the Apostle) is the mystery hid since the world began, and from all ages, but now is made manifest to his Saints, to whom God would make known, what is the riches of his glorious mystery among the gentiles, which riches is Christ in you, the hope of glory, and in whom euery man may be perfect. From whence wee learne, that as he which knoweth not Iesus Christ, knoweth nothing, and is a foole and sencelesse, how wise and prudent soeuer he is touching worldly matters: so hee that truly knoweth Christ, is sufficiently wise, and well aduised, how simple soeuer hee seemeth or sheweth to be. For the second point, the kingly Prophet Dauid, is an infallible and true Doctour to proue it, saying, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, blessed are they that keepe his Testimonies, and seeke him with their whole heart. For calling the feare of God the beginning of Wisdom, hee censurcth all those to bee fooles, that submit not themselves vnder his obedience. As if hee should say, that all those that feare not to offend their Creator, and liue not according to his Lawes and Commandements, are like vnto senselesse and ignorant beastes, and know not the first grounds and rudiments of wisdom. To conclude, it is most true, that all those that know not to what end they liue heere on earth, are fooles, and altogether without vnderstanding. Now wee are borne and liue also to the end, that wee should exercise our selues in the seruice of God. Then it followeth, that there is no greater blindnesse, nor beastly dulnesse, then when we despise the counsell and instructions giuen vnto vs by God, to walke in his wayes, and according to his commandements, and apply our minds and actions cleane contrary. But if we desire to shew true wisdom, let vs feare God, let vs willingly beare his yoke, and let vs in true faith and obedience, be content and ready to be gouerned by his most holy word.

4. The conclusion of this Chapter.

To end this Discourse, and to beate downe and suppress all humane presumption, it shall not bee amisse to insert that which Socrates said of himselfe, which was, that hee knew but one thing, that is, that hee knew nothing; therein speaking better and trulier then he thought he had done. For if a man adorned and instructed with and in so many notable sciences as hee was, should bee moued neuertheless to confesse that hee knew nothing, in regard and comparison of that whereof hee was ignorant; namely, in morall and naturall sciences, although hee had applied his minde and whole study thereunto: how much more ought hee (that by reason should bee farre wiser then Socrates) to confesse and acknowledge that he knoweth nothing, if hee hath not the vnderstanding of diuine science requisite for the saluation of his soule? And therefore wee conclude, that it is in vaine for vs to thinke our selues to bee wise, if wee know not that all humane wisdom, science, and vnderstanding, (without the knowledge of Iesus Christ, and the science of saluation) is but meere folly. And if also wee vnderstand not that, wee are but fooles and senselesse, when wee are not well aduised Christians. But if wee will conuert and turne vnto GOD, obseruing that course of life, which wee are taught by his holy Word to hold, thereby to attaine to heaven and eternall beatitude. Then wee shall amend our liues like Christian Philosophers, according to the will and pleasure of him that created vs, thereby in the end to become heires of his kingdome and eternall glory, through his sonne Iesus Christ our Lord.

That man being a Christian, should with all his heart, affect seuen principall things, requisite and necessarie to attaine eternall life. Whereof the foure first are, the Church, the Word of God, the Sacraments, and Prayer. Chap. 9.

1. Two Families or Cities of all men, the one Terrestriall, the other Celestially.

AS we began our Christian Philosophie with the consideration of the diuision which the holy Scriptures setteth downe of all mankind; making two sorts of them: one, the children of God; the other, the children of the diuell. So wee must proceed in the like manner to consider of them, diuided into two Families or Cities; and as we haue already shewed, that the children of God are specially to reforme in themselves seuen great and notorious follies, so wee thinke it fit for them to consider of seuen principall things requisite and altogether necessarie to attaine eternall life. Touching the first point, Saint Augustine hath written 22. bookes in his most painefull and admirable worke intituled, The Citie of God, wherein most learnedly, hee describeth the beginning and continuance of the family of God, vntill the time that hee liued, about 400. yeares after the Church of God was planted vpon that foundation, which Iesus Christ with his Apostles

Apostles had laid. He calleth the one a Terrestriall, the other a Celestiall citie; one, the citie of the great King, and Spirituall Sion, the other the citie of the Devill, and of Babylon. According to that which Saint Iohn writeth in the Apocalips. For as Adam by his transgression overthrow himselfe, and all his posteritie. And Cain his sonne, vpon that sinne, and by the murder of his brother Abel, raised the family of the Devill: God by his diuine decree, hauing from all eternitie, among all the seede of mankinde, that were to bee borne vpon earth, chosen and elected those, who by speciall grace, hee would preordaine to bee one day made heires of his glory in life euermlasting: at that time also laid the foundation of his heavenly Citie in Iesus Christ (the second person in the Deitie, and the first borne of all creatures) by the promise of his comming in the flesh. Those are the children of God, among whom he dwelleth by his spirit, as long as they liue in the world, enriching them with his most precious gifts, as much as hee thinketh to bee expedient for them to walke in the wayes of his heavenly kingdome. To the which end, and for the same purpose, hee worketh so, that by beleueing in the holy Scriptures, the Saviour of the world is giuen vnto them, as hee himselfe, by the preaching of his holy word, begetteth that faith in them, and by degrees increaseth the same, by such meanes as it hath pleased him to ordaine for that holy ministrie.

2. Seven principall things necessary to attaine to eternall life, The first is, the holy Church, whereof all the children of God ought to bee members.

Wee say, that a Christian ought withall his heart to affect seven principall things, as beeing most necessary and requisite meanes to obtaine eternall life. Which are, the Church, the Word of God, the Sacraments, Prayer, reading of the holy Scriptures, Charitie, and Almes. Touching the first of these exquisite things, euery man knoweth, that wee all acknowledge one holy and Catholique Church, to the which God hath committed (as a sacred gage or pledge) all his rich treasures, to distribute them among vs for our saluations. For hee will that in the bosome or lappe thereof, and as by a good mother, his children should bee gathered together, nourished, and entertained, vntill they become perfect men in Iesus Christ, when by his grace they shall haue attained vnto the last end and purpose of faith, and receiued the crowne of glory. Whereby it is easie to bee vnderstood, that there is no greater euill in the world, then not to be of the Church, and consequently that wee ought specially to bee carefull to conioyne our selues therewith, and to be true members thereof.

The titles which the holy Ghost giueth her, when he calleth her the kingdome of God, the house of God, the pillar and proppe of trueth, and the mother of the children of God: evidently and clearly shew vnto vs, how great and important a duetie (for the glorie of God, and the salvation of man) it is in vs to bee conioyned and vnited to the true Church. As also when shee is called the beautifull Bride, or Spouse without spot, the faithfull Citie, the Citie of Righteousnesse, the Temple of God, the Congregation of Saints, the bodie of Christ. For thereby wee are evidently taught, that as the members of the Church, are acknowledged to bee holy, and to bee a part of the bodie of Iesus Christ the Sonne of God: So they that are neither in the Church, nor of the Church, neither yet holy, nor members of Christ, necessarily are of the family of Sathan, (which the holy Scripture calles the uncleane Spirit, and are part of his body. And therefore all the faithfull beleue (and it is most true) that true light, saluation, and life, are resident in the Church of GOD, and out of it darkenesse, destruction, and death. We know that the controuersie at this day is greater then ever it was, touching this point of the Church. But it is not our intent heerein to harpe vpon that string, neither to decide or dispute of any other question touching Christianitie, It shall bee the subiect of a greater matter of Diuinitie, when wee are once well formed and grounded in godlinesse and vertue, by this our Christian Philosophie, grounded vpon certaine and generall rules, farre from any cause of disputation. It shall suffice heerein to consider the Church as it is one, holy, and Catholike: one, because in vnitie of faith and charitie, it comprehendeth all the children of God, that are, that haue beene, and that euer shall be: holy, because in it, God iustificeth and cleanseth from sinne, those whom hee hath chosen in Christ, to make his mercy and glory shine and appeare in them:

Catholike, because it is spread and disperfed abroad, throughout the vniuerfal world, vnder one head Iefus Chrift. To this Church we are all bound to vnite our felues, thereby to liue happily both in earth and in heauen.

3. The word of God is the first and fure meanes to vnite man to the Church.

Secondly, wee are singularly to confider the meanes ordained for vs by God, to ioyne and vnite our felues to his Church; which wee learne evidently and most clearely out of the holy Scriptures in diuers notable places, where it is said, That God hath placed in his house, some to bee Apostles, some Prophets, some Euangeliftes, some Pastours, and some Teachers, for the repairing of the Saints, for the worke of the Ministerie, and for the edification of the body of Chrift. As they are all sent to preach the Gospel to euery creature, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son, & the holy Ghost. For as the Lord himselfe witnesseth, That this is eternall life, to know thee to be the onely very God, and whom thou hast sent Iefus Chrift; to know him I say, that is, to honour him as wee ought to doe; that hee may bee our Master and our Father, and that wee may bee his children, seruants, and people, dedicated to his glory: and to teach and shew vs the way to this felicitie, hee hath left vs his holy word, which heere on earth is vnto vs as a gate, and entry to goe into the kingdome of heauen. Therefore he saith, My sheepe heare my voyce, and I know them, and they follow mee. Againe, Hee that is of God, beareth the words of God. And the holy Ghost throughout the whole Scriptures, noteth the end and true vse of the preaching of this word, by the title which he attributeth thereunto; calling it the ministry of reconciliation, the Gospel of peace, the word of grace, the word of saluation, and the word of eternall life: Whereby wee learne, that those are Gods sheepe, Gods children, and members of the Church, that are reconciled to God, that haue peace of conscience, that feele the grace and fauour of God in their soules, and that hope for saluation, and life eternall, through Iesus Chrift, according to the certaine testimonies of his holy Gospel. Wee cannot bee saved, vnlesse wee bee illuminated with the heavenly light, which leadeth vs to life eternall. And wherethe Lord calleth his Apostles the light of the world: and Saint Paul saith, that God sent him to be a light, and saluation to the Gentiles, that is also vnderstood by all those that are called to announce and preach the same doctrine. For it is not in regard of their persons, but of the word and Gospel which they preach, that they are called lights: and therefore, he that wil clearely see and behold the way to heauen, ought carefully to hearken vnto, and to heare those, whose preaching is the shining light vnto man, that hee may not erre nor wander out of the heavenly way.

Againe, the Lord commandeth Saint Peter to feede his Lambes. And the blessed Apostle exhorteth his companions in the holy ministrie to doe the like: as Saint Paul also speaking to the Ministers of Ephesus, sheweth them, that the holy Ghost had placed them in that vocation, to feed the Church of God. Then whosoever desireth to haue fit nourishment for his soule, and not let it languish, want, and finally die: ought to labour to that ende, that it may bee fed, and nourished by the Word of God, and by the preaching thereof. This preaching is called, the key of the kingdome of heauen. Whereby wee are taught, that as by the holy ministrie, heauen is opened vnto those, that heare and beleeue the Gospel preached: so they that haue no care, nor make no conscience to heare it, are excluded from thence. For it is in the Church onely, that the Word is faithfully and purely preached. Therefore all the daies of our liues, wee ought to be carefull to bee taught and instructed therein, and by that meanes to vnite our felues more and more in the family of our mother the Church, and spouse of our Lord and Sauour Iesus Chrift. Besides this, let vs be warie, not onceto imagine, or to thinke, that being partly instructed, wee neede no more heare the Word preached. For wee must daily and alwaies be Disciples of Iesus Chrift, in the Schoole of his Church, vnder the ministrie of the Pastors which hee sendeth vs. Those that know most, know but in part (as Saint Paul saith) and the preaching of the Gospell is ordained to profit vs, untill that wee become perfect men. And that wee shall haue attained vnto the measure of the age of the fulnesse of Chrift: which perfection cannot obtaine the full ende and purpose thereof, but onely after death.

4 The Sacraments and publike praier, are other true and sure meanes to vnite vs to the Church.

Consequently for an other meanes, neerer to vnite vs to the Church, we haue the holy Sacraments, ordained and appointed therein, by our Lord Iesus Christ; for by them in the family of Christ, wee receiue the seales and certaine gages of our spirituall regeneration, and in all truth and vertue communicate all the good things of God, and the graces, which our great Sauour brought from heauen, to make vs obtaine saluation and eternall life. If wee were of a spirituall nature, like vnto the Angels, wee could onely with the Spirit contemplate and beholde G O D, and all his graces, and so bee made happie. But because wee are inueloped and couered with our grosse and terrestriall bodies, it is necessarie that God should vse among vs, sacred and visible signes, thereby to represent vnto vs, those spirituall and visible things, which by the vertue of his spirit, he accomplisheth in vs, for otherwise wee could not comprehend them: as also that it is expedient for vs, that all our senses should be exercised by exteriour testimonies, in the apprehension and meditation of the diuine promises, not onely to carry and bring vs wholly to the glory of our creatour and redeemer, but also to make vs more certaine, and fully satisfied in our consciences, of the mercy & grace of God towards vs. For although in truth, the holy Ghost is he onely that can touch and mooue our hearts, illuminate our vnderstandings, and assure our mindes, in such manner that it may be iudged to be his worke onely; therby to yeeld thanks & praise vnto God. Neuertheles, his maiesty aideth himself with the Sacraments, as inferiour instruments to perfect his worke in vs, as he thinketh good, and as it hath pleased him to ordaine (both in his holy Gospell and also in the ancient law) for the ease and solace of our infirmities. Wherefore, seeing that Iesus Christ, hath introduced those holy mysteries in his Church, to be celebrated in memory of him, and in regard of the necessity that we haue of them, we must be very carefull to communicate the same with deuotion and reuerence, according to the accustomed manner vsed among all true and faithfull Christians. Whereunto we must referre that which the Scripture saith, (know you not that al we which haue bin baptised into Iesus Christ, haue bin baptised into his death? we are buried with him by baptisme into his death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead, so the glory of the Father, so we also should walke in newnes of life.) Againe, for ye are all the sonnes of God by faith in Iesus Christ, for all ye that are baptized in Christ haue put on Christ. There is neither Iew nor Grecian, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for you are all one in Iesus Christ; and if you be Christs, then you are Abrahams seed, and heires by promise. Againe, this sacred signe being confirmed vnto vs, by inuocation of the name of the Lord, it is a certain assurance vnto vs, that our sinnes are washed away, and that we are saued by his mercy, and the renewing of the holy Ghost. Againe, the cup of blessing, which we blesse, is it not the Communion of the blood of Christ? the bread which we breake, is it not the Communion of the body of Christ? take, eate, this is my body which is broken for you doe this in remembrance of me. This cuppe is the new testament in my blood, this doe as oft as you drink it in remembrance of me. For as often as you shall eate this bread and drinke this cup, you shew the Lords death till he comes. Againe except you eate the flesh of the sonne of man, & drinke his blood, you haue no life in you. Whosoever eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternall life, and I will raise him vp at the latter day. For my flesh is meate indeed, and my blood drinke indeed; be that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me, and I in him.

Fourthly, wee account and esteeme the inuocation of the name of God, according to the forme vsed in the Church, to bee an other holy meanes to vnite and hold vs firmly in the same. For seeing that by prayer, all the seruice of God is oftentimes signified in the holy Scriptures, and that his seruants and children are ordinarily noted and knowen by this testimony, that they inuoked the name of the Lord, it appeareth evidently, that those which despise the order established in his Church, to pray and to yeeld publike thanks vnto him; cut themselves off from the number of his children and seruants. Our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ calleth the Temple, the house of prayer: thereby shewing vs manifestly, that the principall part of the seruice that God requireth at our handes, is, that wee should assemble together to call vpon his Name. Oh Lord, saith David, praise waiteth for thee in Zion; and vnto thee shall the vowes be performed. By those words signifying, that the prayers of the Church are so certainly heard, that God which vnderstandeth them, will, that with supplications, thanksgiuings shall bee ioyned with full assurance of faith, to feele the fruites of the prayer presented vnto him in the Congregation of his people. Therefore when Christians are assembled together, and with full consent of heart and spirit, accompany the prayers which the minister pronounceth, as the mouth of the Church, euery faithfull Christian may be fully assured that such prayers pierce the heauens, and that God is moued to heare them, not that he is subiect to any passiō, (as we are) to be moued at our words or supplications, but we must alwaies vse that manner of application, when we speake of his Deity, which hauing no cause, and beeing infinite, and onely so hath all his effects and workes so compassed in regard of vs, that hauing no proportion with his diuine and eternall essence, we must speake like men. Men cannot speake in better manner, for that is all that they can doe. Angels may possibly say more, and in better sort, but let them speake as well as they can, things finite cannot declare, comprehend, nor vnderstand, what belongeth to the infinite. Let vs content our selues, here to admire and praise his goodnes, in that it pleaseth him to assure vs by his word, that by the feeling that we haue of our owne afflictions, he assureth vs of his mercy, and great loue and charity towards vs. Therefore in all times and ages, all people and nations of the world, (both Christians and Idolaters,) assembled together, and in their assemblies offered sacrifices, and made publike prayers. This knowledg being imprinted in the hearts of al men, that haue any religion in them, that they must assemble together, to call vpon the name of the Lord, and to serue him, and that it is an honor which he requireth at the hands of euery man, and the meanes for vs to obtaine his eternall blessings.

5. Conclusion of this Chapter.

Matth. 13:44. To conclude this point, seeing the Church is the kingdome of God, and That it is likened to a precious pearle, and to a rich treasure hidden in the fields, which whosoener findeth, he hideth it, and for ioy thereof selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. Let vs esteeme nothing more deare, nor more precious, then to be in his Church, all the daies of our life. Saying with Psal. 84:1, 2. David, Oh Lord of Hosts, how amiable are thy Tabernacles, my soule longeth, yea, and fainteth for the courts of the Lord, for my heart and flesh reioice in the living God, blessed are they that dwell in thy house they will praise thee vncessantly. For a day in thy house is better then a thousand elsewhere. I had rather bee a doore keeper in the house of my God, then to dwell in the tabernacle of wickednesse. For if Dan a man and a Prophet, so excellently endued with faith and godlinesse, herein plainly confessed, and so often in many other places also, the necessity that hee had to be in the Church of God, feeling himselfe in a manner rauished with an ardent desire to enioy so great a benefit: what ought wee to acknowledge and feele: wee I say, that are so ignorant, so weake, and so corrupt, in the middle of an infinite number of dangers and assaults, which wee daily incurre and sustaine in this world? And seeing that this Church cannot bee without her misteries, order, and pollicie, and that the Word of God, and the holy doctrine thereof, is as the soule of the Church, and the Sacraments and prayers, the true and quickning foode, and as it were the sinewes of the whole body of Christ to mainetaine the same; Let vs be carefull holily and orderly to obserue all the exercises of piety, and Christian discipline established in the Church.

That it is the duty of a Christian, not to neglect the vse of particular prayers, nor the reading of the holy Scriptures, that hee may know how to practise the doctrine thereof. Chap. 10.

1. The assistance of God is necessarie for all men, and consequently Prayer.

IF wee had a true feeling knowledge of our owne estate and condition, and of the force and efficacie of praier, wee should neede no aduise nor aduertisement to pray often vnto God, to present our vows vnto him, to beseech him to inspire vs with, and to encrease in vs, the vnderstanding of the truth, to augment faith, charity, patience, humility, and other his his good graces an spirituall gifts in vs, to fortifie and strengthen vs against the temptations and assaults of the world, the flesh and the diuell, to giue vs all things necessary for this life, to preserue vs from so many dangers, wherewith we are environed: and especially and aboue al things, to giue vs his holy spirit, to guide & conduct vs holily and vprightly while we liue here on earth. He that feeleth not what need hee hath of such graces and giftes of God, and consequently to pray vnto God, for the obtaining thereof, is altogether senseles & misadvised. For as we haue noted in the precedent chapter, how much publike praiers, & preaching of the word of God, are necessary and profitable for vs in the Church, to vnite vs more and more vnto the same, and consequently to Iesus Christ, and by him to God: so we must vnderstand, that to obtaine the same, the vse of particular, and domesticall pray-ers, and the priuate reading of the holy Scriptures, also do serue, and are of great vse vnto vs to giue vs the vnderstanding of that holy writ, and to practise the diuine doctrine thereof. First, because euery man in his vocation hath great need of the assistance and fauor of God; therefore it followeth, that he ought to pray vnto him, for without his grace which by prayer wee obtaine, all that wee doe is but meere folly, and vanity. But when wee pray vnto God, remembering his promises and the experience of his grace and fauour, and that wee beseech him to guide and conduct vs, as a father doth his children: it is a good, and an assured meanes for vs to beleue, that all whatsoever shall happen vnto vs, in what estate and condition soeuer we be, is by the means and motion of his diuine prouidence, and that it is her will and pleasure, which cannot but bee good towards vs. Therefore not onely euery master & ruler of a house, should euery euening and morning pray vnto God, with his household, but also particularly call vpon him, and euery one in his vocation should doe the like, to the ende that fathers and mothers may obtain grace of God, to teach & conduct their children wel: magistrates and pastors to execute their charges and offices holily and vprightly: marchants & artificers to exercise & vse their arts & trafficks honestly: and euery one in general is to pray, that God will blesse the in their conditions, estates, works, and labors: & besides we may haue diuers persos of our acquaintance and kindred, whose estates may be such that they shall need our prayer vnto God for them. To conclude, there is not any Christian whatsoever, that after he shall haue prayed particularly vnto the Lord, as time, place, persons and necessity requireth, but hath neede daily to practise that which Iesus Christ teacheth vs, saying, you shall pray thus, Our Father which art in heauen, &c. For the zeale that we ought to haue to the glory of God, the charity which we should shew towards our neighbours, and the good that we wish vnto our selues, moueth vs euery day to make this prayer vnto God; and so much the carefulier and earnestlier, as saying it from the mouth of Iesus Christ, that made it: we are assured to be heard, and consequently to serue for the advancement of the kingdome of God, to the good and saluation of our brethren, and for our owne benefit.

2. Examples and considerable aduertisements touching Prayer.

It is certaine, that the most excellent seruants of God, addicted themselves most vnto priuate, and particular praiers. We reade of Moses, that He continued 40. daies and 40. nights prostrate on the ground before the face of God, that his prayer for the people might be heard. And Samuel protests saying, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord, & cease praying for you. But specially Dauid in his diuine canticles, sheweth that he was in a maner tied vnto prayers by ordinary exercise, saying to that purpose, I prevented the morning light, and prayed, for I waited on thy word, mine eies preuent the night watches, to meditate on thy word. And I cried vnto the Lord and prayed vnto him early in the morning. Cornelius the Centurian prayed earnestly vnto God, and received this answer of the Angell of the Lord, saying: Thy prayers and thine almes are come up into remembrance before God. And Saint Paul in diuers of his epistles saith, that he prayed vnto God incessantly night and day, for the Church, and ceased not to giue thanks for them, making mention of them in his praiers, and exhorteth al the faithfull by his example to praie without ceasing, and to perseuere in praier, watching in the same, with thanksgiuing. To moue vs to follow this example, let vs speciallie note the words of Iesus Christ, when thou praiest (saith he) enter into thy chamber, and when thou hast shutte the doore, praie vnto thy Father which is in secret, and thy father which is in secret shall reward thee openlie. And although this exhortation speciallie tendeth, to correct the hypo-

crise of those, that make open shewes and boastings of their deuotions, the Lord neuerthelesse by that doctrine giueth vs a generall instruction (and that very profitable) to exercise our selues in praier, not onely publikely, but also priuately, withdrawing our selues into our Chambers to pray, with assurance in his promise, that it shall not bee done without profit. And so wee reade of Isaac, that hee went out of his house into the fields, to meditate and pray vnto God. And Saint Peter withdrew himselfe apart, vpon the top of the house (for the roofes of the Iewes houses were flat) to pray vnto God. And Iesus Christ himselfe went oftentimes aside to pray. In like manner wee shall not doe amisse, If according to his example, wee withdraw our selues apart, so much the freelier and quietlier without trouble or disturbance, to lift vp our hearts vnto God, presenting vnto him the pleasing sacrifice of our lips. And because wee are not willingly enclined thereunto, but rather carelessse and negligent in such spirituall exercises, wee shall doe the duties of faithfull Christians, when wee accustome our selues to pray certaine houres in the day, not superstitiously, but to helpe our infirmities and slackenesse; for otherwise it may bee, wee would oftentimes passe the day ouer without praying. Dauid so much exercised in Spirituall workes, practised this instruction, as hee sheweth, saying, That hee called vpon the Lord, in the euening, in the morning, and at noone time. And it is written of Daniel, That three times every day hee entred into his chamber to pray vnto God.

Touching the reading of the word of God, if we doe not exercise our selues therein carefully and diligently, it is as much as in vs lieth to contemne that which he often commandeth vs to doe, throughout the whole Scriptures. For Saint Paul writing to the Colossians, saith thus, (Let the word of God dwell in you plenteously in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing your owne selues) he speaketh to all the congregation of that Church, and desireth that the doctrine of the Gospell should bee so common and familiar among them, that it might in a manner be rooted in their minds, that thereby they themselves might not onely be instructed, but others also profite by them. Saint Peter likewise writeth to all the faithfull Iewes and commendeth them, because they took heed, to the word and doctrine of the Prophets as vnto a light that shineth in a darke place. Which is as much, as if he exhorted vs together with them, to take good heed vnto those sacred oracles, and to make them familiar & common vnto, and among vs, that by them we may be directed to the light of life. As Dauid also saith. That the word of God was a lanthorne to his feete, and a light vnto his pathes. Againe the Apostle calleth the word of God, the sword of the spirit, wherewith he would haue all the faithfull to be armed, to fight against Sathan, which they could not doe, if they did not diligently and oftentimes reade the holy Scriptures, by the example of Iesus Christ, to withstand and repulse the temptations of the Diuell, saying (It is written, it is written.) And further if Saint Paul saith, whatsoeuer things are written aforetime, are writtē for our learning that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might haue hope, it would bee a meanes to make Gods providence vnprofitable vnto vs, that hath given vs, and at all times miraculously preferred the same registers of his word, if wee should not carefullie and diligently reade them, thereby to be comforted and fortified in faith and hope of that, which therein is revealed vnto vs in Christ, for our saluation. Let vs hereunto adde, that if all the Scriptures (as the same Apostle witnesseth are given by inspiration of God, & are profitable to teach, to conuince, to correct, and to instruct in righteousness, that the man of God may be absolute, being made perfect vnto all good workes. It followeth from thence, that wee taught diligently to exercise our selues in the reading and meditation of those sacred registers of the holy Ghost, from them to gather so excellent and notable fruits. All men are flatterers, and we are all blinde in our owne conceits and imaginations, and suffer our selues naturally to be led away by them. Therefore it is necessary for vs, oftentimes to heare God speake vnto vs, by his Prophets and Apostles, which instruct, reprove, correct, and exhort vs to doe our duties. Saint Luke much commendeth the Bereans, because they searched the Scriptures daily, to know whether that which Saint Paul preached vnto them, was therein contained, that they might beleue, and so confirme themselves in Christian faith. The Eunuche of Candaces Queene of Ethiopia, riding in a Chariot tooke time to reade the Prophecie of Esay. Whereby we are to consider that which is written vpon the same same place by Saint Chrysostome, speaking against those that excuse themselves, for not reading the holy Scriptures, alledging them to be difficult, and obscure, saying remember the Ethiopian Eunuch, who notwithstanding that he was a barbarian, hindered by innumerable affaires, and busines of the world, and vnderstood not what he reade, would not trauell by the way, without reading the Scriptures; then how much lesse did he neglect the same when he was at home in his house? And if he read them when he did not vnderstand them, how much the rather and the sooner did he reade them after hee had beene instructed therein? And God seeing his diligence, and great zeale, sent Phillip vnto him to teach him. God will not dislike nor dispise our affection and desire to profite in his holy word, but to the contrary often reading the same, he will make vs feeble and perceiue the truth of this promise, which is (that they shall all be taught of God) let vs be ashamed, (saith he in another place,) that a woman hauing had five husbands, and she a Samaritane, was so diligent and attentiu to learne, that neither the time nor her busines could cause her to leaue Christ, by whom she desired to be taught: and that we being Christians, seek not, neither yet enquire after any thing that concerneth our instructions in diuine things. Who is he, that being at home in his house, doth any thing worthy of the name of a Christian? Doe any of vs employ our time to inquire of, and seeke to vnderstand the Scriptures: to the contrary we shall sooner see a paire of tables, or a chesse bord lie before many men to play thereon, but the bible little or neuer in their hands, to reade therein. And yet we must know that the holy Scriptures are giuen vnto vs, to read and to imprint them in our hearts. The bookes of the Prophets and Apostles (saith he in another place) are the artificiall instruments of Christians, to make them obtaine saluation, and life eternall. And vpon these words of the Apostle (let the word of God dwell in you plentifully in all wisdom) hee saith, ye that liue heere on earth, hauing wiues and children harken and vnderstand, how Saint Paul specially commandeth you to reade the holy Scriptures, and not slightly nor carelessly, but continually and diligently: buy the bible, which is the cure of the Soule, therein to learne wholesome and good instruction, for ignorance of the holy Scriptures, is the cause of all euill. Saint Hierom doth not exempt young children from reading of the Scriptures. When a yong girle (saith he) is seuen yeeres old, and beginneth to be shamefast, to know what she should not speake, and to doubt what she should say, let her learne the Psalter by hart, and till shee cometh to twelue yeeres of age, let her make the booke of Salomon, the new Testament and the writings of the Prophets a Treasure in her hart. Againe, let her loue those diuine bookes in stead of precious stones, and costly apparel, and let not the gilded and faire outside of those bookes please her better then the true and notable doctrine of faith contained in them: let her first learne by the Psalmes of Dauid, to abandon and forsake the vanities of the world, let her be taught and instructed to liue vertuously, out of the Proverbs of Salomon, let her haue the Gospell alwaies by her, and neuer lay it out of her hands: let her with all her heart study the acts and the epistles of the Apostles: and when she shall haue enriched her soule with such treasures, let her learne the doctrine of the Prophets, and the bookes of Moses: & lastly the canticle of canticles: for if she should read them at the first, she might be hurt in her mind, by not vnderstanding those holy songs, of spirituall marriage, set downe vnder carnall words.

This discourse of Saint Hierome, ought at this day, not onely to make maides and young people ashamed, but men also, yea and such men as thinke themselves most lofty and great personages, though otherwise altogether ignorant of the bookes of the holy Scriptures: Some of them neuer seeing the Bible but on the outside; others contenting themselves slenderly to open it once a weeke, or at the most once a day, as it were going by, and it sufficeth them to haue some small beginning in Christian instructions, how obscure and meane soeuer it bee; not once remembring, that it is our duties as long as wee liue, to encrease more and more in the knowledge of the mysteries of our saluation: As without doubt the frequent and often reading of the holy Word of God, imparteth vnto vs that notable benefit. For by often hearing Christ speak vnto vs, by little and little we learne to vnderstand the language of the holy Ghost. And as there are diuers odoriferous drugs, which the more you rub them, the sweeter sauer they yeeld; so the more we search, reade and handle the holy Scriptures, so much the more they giue vs the knowledge and feeling of the Treasures, and delightfull fruits, which they keepe and closely hold in their sacred oracles. And if some men reape no profite by reading them, let them accuse and blame their owne default; in that they do not prepare themselves as they ought, to heare God speak them vnto vs: Such are all they that open the Bible, as if they held a prophane booke in their hands, are not attentiueto that which is written therein, and which are not mouued with an ardent desire to profite thereby, for the glory of God, their owne saluation, and the amendment of their liues: And to be short, that pray not vnto God, to giue them his holy spirit, to vnderstand his will, and the truth thereof, that they might walke in the same, and liue accordingly here on earth. For with the reading of those holy booke, we must ioine piety, the feare of God, and a true intent & affection to amend our liues. And doing so, we may assure our selues, to obtaine that which is written in the Psalmes. That God reuealeth his secrets to them that feare and honour him, and giueth them the knowledge of his covenant. To them (I say) that aske him the Spirit of Wisedome, thereby to vnderstand the mysteries of his holy word.

4. Conclusion of this Chapter.

To conclude we must amend our negligence and carelesnes, in not imploying our time in priuate and particular prayers, from hence forth so addicting our hearts and earnest zeales thereunto, that watching and praying vnto God continually, our requests may be shewed vnto him in prayers and supplications, with thanksgiving, (as Saint Paul saith.) And to accomplish that aduertisement with Saint Peter giueth vs, to be alwaies ready to giue an answer to every man that asketh vs a reason of the hope that is in vs, with meeknes and reuerence, hauing a good conscience: let vs be carefull and diligent to reade, and often to meditate the word of God, that with Saint Augustine we may say: It is my delight and pleasure oh Lord to heare speaking of thee, to talke of thee, to write of thee, and to imprint in my hart that which I reade of thee. Therefore I enter into the delightful meadows of the holy Scriptures, therein I finde the faire Greene herbes of sacred sentences, which I eate and chaw, and gather and lay vp in the closet of my memory, whereby we are to note that the meaning of all this is, to direct our liues according to the will and commandements of God, and by that meanes to put in effect and practise, not onely that which wee shall reape out of the sacred vergiers of his holy word, but also what graces and blessings soeuer wee shall obtaine of him by our prayers. Wherein consisteth the full height of our good and perfection, and by this meanes the Soule vniteth it selfe with God, as to her last end, renouncing her owne will to fulfill the will of her creatour, and to doe as he commandeth. Otherwise, let vs not esteeme our selues to be Christians and children of God, to learne the knowledge of him, if we do not the workes that belong thereunto. Blessed are they (saith Iesus Christ) that heare the word of God and keepe it. And Saint Paul sayth, The bearers of the law are not righteous before God, but the doers of the law shall be iustified. And Saint Iames, bee you doers of the word, and not bearers onely, deceiuing your owne selues, for as a sunne without light, is but the picture of the sunne, a coale without fire, is a dead coale, and a body without motion liueth not, so (as Saint Iames saith) faith without workes is dead. And to end with the words of the Apostle, (But you haue not so learned Christ, if so be you haue heard him, and haue bin taught by him, as the truth is in Iesus, that is, that you cast off (concerning the conuersation in times past) that old man, which is corrupted through the decciuable lusts, and be renewed in the Spirit of your mindes, and put on the new man, which after God, is created vnto righteousness and true holynes.) Let vs alwaies seeke to liue so, that at the last we may bee without reproofe, spotte, wrinkle, or blame, and that the image of God may bee replcate and shine in vs.

That a Christian ought with an ardent zeale to embrace charity, and be carefull to giue almes, and to helpe the poore. Chap. 11.

1. Man by nature hath a sinnefull body, and in many good things is inferior vnto beasts.

If we desire to know what man became by the fall and transgression of Adam, it is the very same that Saint Paul (following the Prophet David,) setteth downe, saying. That there is no man iust, no not one, none that understandeth, none that seeketh God, none that doth Good, Their throte is an open Sepulchre, deceit is in their tongues : The venim of Aspice is vnder their lippes : Their mouthes are full of cursings and bitterness ; destruction and miserie is in their waies ; They haue not knowne the way of peace, and the feare of the Lord is not before their eies. It is a wonderfull corruption, that diuers bealls surpasse man in many vertues, as the Doue in simplicitie, the Ante in diligence and industrie, the Storke in humanity, the Dogge in loue and fidelitie, the Oxe and the Ass in memory, and acknowledging of benefits, the Lambe in meekenesse, the Lion in magnanimitie, the Cocke in watchfulnesse and liberalitie, the Serpent in wisdom, and all of them in sobrietie and contentment. But which is woorse, touching vice, man surpasseth all bealls ; being more traitesrous and cruell then a Woolfe, craftier then a Fox, prowder then a Peacocke, more voluptuous and vnthankfull then a Hogge, and more dangerous then an Aspice. And to fill vp the measure of his euils, Thow wicked inclinations which are alone, and particularly in diuers bealls, are oftentimes found to bee altogether (or at the least a great part of them) in one man. For there are many men couetous, proud, subtil, cruell enuious, vnthankfull, and theeuers all at one time : and which is more, If the heart of man bee destitute of the Grace of G O D, hee is the most dangerous and venomous beast in the world, and the receptacle of all disordered desires. And for that many members vnited together make a body, the Apostle calleth the body of sinne, a heape of sinnes, euery vice being as it were a member of that body.

By which assertion wee may well say, that as in the body of a sheepe, all the parts are good and profitable ; as the flesh to eate, the wooll to make cloth, the guts to make strings for muscull Instruments, and so of all the rest : in man it is cleane contrary, for all things in him are naught, and serue to doe euill, his reason to deceive, his libertie to disordered lust, his eies to see and behold vanitie, his heart to couet the same, his hands to fight and sleale, his feete to runne vnto euill, and his tongue to slauder, lye, and blaspheme : In such manner, that there is no member in man, that serueth not for a instrument of some iniquitie. (As S. Paul saith) and for that cause hee admonisheth vs, not to mortifie two or three members of this body of sinne, but the whole body, and so to put off the whole man :
 which Iesus Christ calleth the forsaking of our selues.

2. The loue of God, and of righteousness, conioyned by the band of Charitie, are the fountaine of all good things.

Heerein consisteth the true subiect of our Christian Phylosophie, that is, that renouncing and forsaking our naturall corruption, wee endeavour to attaine vnto the end of our Regeneration in Christ by his holy Spirit, in such manner that in our life there may bee a sweete melodie and accord, betweene the charitie and righteousness of God, and our loue and obedience. By this meanes ratifying and confirming the adoption, whereby he hath accepted of vs to bee his children ; for so the Image of God shall be repayred and renewed in vs, when wee amend and conuert vnto him, to loue and feare him, and to walke in newnesse of life, to his glorie, and for our owne saluation. And as the Phylosophers haue certaine ends and purposes of honestie and vprightnesse, whereunto they leade and direct all perticular offices, and actions of vertue, that man ought to frame himselfe vnto : so the holy Scriptures, in that respect haue their manner of working, much better, and more certaine then all humane wisdom, and consisteth in two parts. The one to imprint in our hearts the loue of God, and of all righteousness, from the which by our naturall corruption we are vtterly fallen. The other to giue and prescribe vnto vs a certaine rule, which suffereth vs not to erre and wander here and there, nor to take a wrong course for the direction of our liues, to liue holily and vprightly.

Touching the first point, which in this place is the subiect of our argument. The holy Scriptures haue many excellent, good and strong reasons to induce and incline our hearts to charity, & consequently to the loue of that which is good, they being things in such manner conioined, that the one is the ground and spring of the other. For charitie is the one-ly true cause and motion of all good workes, which in truth, is the proper effect of charitie ; which in it hath two respects : the first towards God, according to that which we are commanded by Iesus Christ to doe, for the accomplishing of the Lawe : that is, To loue

Mat. 22. 37.

Ioh. 4. 7. 8.

God withall our hearts, with all our soules, and with all our strengths, and our neighbour as our selues: to loue God I say for his owne sake, and our neighbour for the loue of God. To make vs bend all our actions to attaine to this perfection, the holy Scriptures could not lay a better foundation, then to tell vs, that Charity proceedeth from God, that hee that loueth is borne of God, and knoweth God, and that hee that loueth not, knoweth not God, for God is charity. For by this wee learne that God is the fountaine and spring of loue, and that his affection runneth into and spreadeth it selfe abroad in those parts of man, wherein the true knowledge of the Deity dwelleth.

Eph. 2. 4.

Rom. 5. 8.

Ioh. 3. 16.

1. Iohn 4. 19.

In such manner that as the true apprehension of God, necessarily ingendreth in vs the loue of God; so consequently it followeth, that where there is no charity, there is no true knowledge of God. And therefore we may well say, that we loue God, according to the knowledge that wee haue of him, and of his benefits towards vs. As wee are taught that God loued vs, at such time as wee were his enemies, and dead by sinne, yea, and loued vs in such manner, that hee gaue his onely begotten Sonne, that whosoever belieueth in him should not perish, but haue life euerlasting. Which maketh vs loue him: (as Saint Iohn saith,) That wee loue God, because hee first loued vs. And so, for that the more hee exhorteth vs to liue vprightly and holily; so much the more cause haue wee, to assure and comfort our selues in the loue which hee beareth vnto vs. For the interieur feeling of our loue towards God, is a certaine testimony vnto vs, that he loueth vs. As Iesus Christ by the signes of loue of the sinnefull woman, weeping at his feete, and washing them with her teares, shewed the Phariesies, that God loued that woman much, & that he had forgiven her many sinnes. For as the sunne is the fountaine & the originall spring of all bodily light, and that without it, there should bee none, and where most light is, necessarily there is a greater participation of his radiant beames. So God is the beginning and fountaine of all charity, so that no creature can loue him well but by himselfe; & where he imparteth more abundance of the heate of his loue, there necessarily appeareth a greater reflection of loue towards the Deity: and further if God did not preuent man, with the fauour and sweetnesse of his loue, embracing him with the living flames of his Charity, there would bee nothing but a kinde of coldnesse in him, and no true knowledge of Gods benefits.

Luk. 7. 38. 47.

Cicero de amicis.

Let vs heere note the saying of an Infidel, that true amitie consisteth onely in willing, and not willing: so wee ought manifestly to shewe our loue towards GOD in conformance and subiection to his will, in desiring to doe that which hee willet vs to doe, and in hating that which displeaseth him. For the highest, the chiefest, and the most perfect degree of loue, is that which leadeth vs to the perfection of vertue, that maketh vs of men to become Angels, and that maketh vs Citizens of heauen, while wee are yet living here on earth. Therefore euery man ought to make account, that he hath so much, and so farre proceeded, and entered into the loue of God, and that hee shall haue so much the more peace and quietnesse of conscience, as hee is lesse in loue with himselfe, and neerer vnited vnto GOD, referring himselfe in all things, at all times, and in all places to the will of GOD, to doe that which he commandeth, and to shunne that which he forbiddeth.

Rom. 13. 10.

Gal. 5. 6.

1. Cor. 13. 1.

1. Iohn 4. 2.

Touching the other point, of the loue of our neighbour: It is the most visible marke of the children of God, and the true disciples of Iesus Christ, and for that cause most recommended, throughout all the holy Scriptures. Specially, by our Lord Iesus Christ, when hee saith, I giue you a commandement, that is to say, whereon men ought to thinke continually, as if it were renewed every houre: That you loue one another, as I haue loued you, to the end that you also should loue one another. By this shall all men know, that you are my disciples, if you haue loue one to another. To the same ende Saint Iohn saith, If wee loue one another, God dwelleth in vs, and his loue is perfect in vs. And Saint Paul, after he had exhorted the faithfull vnto all holinesse and righteousnesse, and specially to the obseruation of this commandement of God, To loue their neighbours as themselves, maketh this conclusion: Therefore loue is the fulfilling of the Law. Whereunto that also tendeth, which hee saith in another place, That faith working by loue; is that which auaileth with Christ, and that without this diuine vertue, all other gifts and graces profit vs nothing. From whence we specially gather this doctrine, that none but those that are truly faithfull, are endued with charitie, because they only know God, by faith in his word; and loue him, and their neighbours in him, for the loue of him. For we must beleue this diuine sentence, That if any man saith that hee loueth God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar.

Thus

Thus you see how the loue of God, and of our neighbours, are inseparable things, to worke and fulfill all righteousness, by the bands of charitie.

3. The duties of Charitie prooued by two naturall reasons.

Consequently, and without going from the matter which we handle, wee may evidently prooue that duetie which God requirerh at our hands, towards our neighbours, by two naturall and iust rules, which necessarily follow the diuine precept, To loue our brother as our selues. The first, (which also was common among Infidels and Pagans) is, That we doe not to others, that which wee would not haue done vnto our selues. The second, consisteth in that which Christ himselfe expressly commandeth, saying, Whatsoeuer you would haue men should doe vnto you, euen so doe you to them, for this is the Law and the Prophets. For the loue of our selues requireth, that wee doe not onely desire, that other men should not hurt, nor doe euill vnto vs, but also that they should doe vs good. Therefore as in one short and brieue sentence, God hath comprehended all that duetie, which wee are to shew one vnto another, that wee may liue together iustly, peaceably and happely: Saying, Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe; so to perfect all commentaries, or discourses that may be made vpon this Christian pollicie, these two naturall rules shall suffice. That is, not to do that vnto another, which wee would not haue done vnto our selues: and to doe to others as wee would they should doe vnto vs. Obseruing well these things, wee shall be clothed with that charitie which Saint Paul calleth the band of perfection. For then there will not be found among vs any iniurie, fraude, wrong, nor outrage: all ambition, pride, enuy, hatred, euill speaking, and other such passions hurtfull to our neighbours would cease, and nothing should be seene nor found among men, but vprightnesse: peace, concord, amitie, and mutuall support and assistance one of another. As Saint Paul very well noteth all these excellent fruits of charitie, writing to the Corinthians. To the which also wee must referre that which Saint Peter saith, Exhorting all the faithfull to purifie their soules, in obeying the truth, through the Spirit, to loue brotherly without faining, louing one another with a pure heart feruently. For as he saith in another place, Charitie couereth a multitude of sinnes.

Matth. 7. 12.

Col. 3. 14.

1 Cor. 13. 4.

1 Pet. 1. 22.

1 Pet. 4. 8.

Now if wee follow this doctrine of the holy Ghost, touching our duties towards our neighbours, there will be nothing to deare nor precious vnto vs, which wee will not be ready to doe, giue, and bestowe, for the loue of them, no not our owne liues. Besides this, the zeale and seruencie of this Christian charitie, will make vs reiect and cast of all that, which by any meanes may coole, or slacken the same: as ingratitude, iniuries, hatred, and all indignities that may be vsed against our brethren. For if wee ought to loue all men, for the loue of God; If the image of our common Father and Creator, which they beare, obligeth and bindeth vs to procure vnto them all the good that wee can, and if they beeing our owne flesh, wee ought wholly to bend our selues to loue them: It followeth, that what indignity soeuer is in them, God ought not neuerthelesse to lose his right: his Image by that meanes is not defaced in them, and the coniunction which he hath set and placed betweene them and vs, still remaineth.

To this purpose let vs note and marke well, In the parable of the Samaritane which Iesus Christ teacheth vs, that euery man whom we know, or know not, a stranger, yea and our enemies, (as the Samaritans and the Iewes were one vnto the other) is our neighbour, whom we ought to loue as our selues. As our Lord also correcting the pride and vaine glory of the Phareesies, declareth: saying, you haue heard that it hath bin sayd, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy, but I say vnto you, loue your enemies: which loue hee will not haue vs to shew in speech onely, but in deed and in our works, in blessing them that curse vs doing good to them that hate vs, and praying for them that hurt and persecute vs. And as Saint Paul saith, If thine enemy hunger, feede him, If he thirst giue him drinke, and so wee shall bee children of our Father which is in heauen, that maketh his Sunne to rise, on the euill and the good. But to loue them that loue you, Publicans and sinners doe the same, saith the Lord.

4. Almes

4. Almes are the proper fruits and effects of Charitie.

Among the testimonies and fruits of our Charitie, the good, helpe, and assistance that wee doe to the poore is one speciall thing. For wee should falsely bragge and boaste of the loue wee beare to our neighbours, if wee shew it not in our endeouours, to helpe and to doe good to those that are poore and needy. Whofoener hath this worlds Goods (saith Saint Iohn) and seeth his brother haue neede, and shutteth vp his compassion from him, how dwelleth the loue of God in him? Let vs not loue with words, and with tongue, but with the heart, and truly. Therefore it is written, that when the Apostles gaue Saint Paul the right hands of fellowship, they recommended no other thing vnto him, but onely that hee should remember the poore. Which hee also did, as hee witnesseth very well in his Epistles. Whereupon it is to bee noted, and specially marked, that the latter iudgement, and the sentence, which our Lord will then giue (of eternall blessednesse or cursednesse) vnto man, shall be grounded vpon our duties of charitie (or the neglect thereof) to the poore. That is it which wee call Almes; which word signifieth pittie and compassion. From whence wee learne, that the aide and assistance which wee giue to those that are in want ought to proceede from the feeling that wee haue of their affliction. As Esay sheweth, saying, If thou poure out thy soule to the hungry, and refreshest the troubled soule, then shall thy light spring out in darkenesse, and thy darkenesse shall bee as the noone day. For by the first part of this sentence hee teacheth vs, That true Almes is as it were an opening and communication of the heart, by compassion feeling an others mans miserie.

And to that ende Saint Iohn proueth, that there is no charity in him, that seeth his brothers neede and shutteth vp his compassion from him. Signifying by the word Compassion: the pittie and mercy wherewith euery man ought to be inwardly touched, for the pouertie of his neighbour, that hee might helpe him in necessitie. For it is most true, that the apprehension which wee haue to heare of the pittifull estate of our neighbour, is of no such force to moue our hearts, to pitie and compassion, as that which the sight thereof procureth. Therefore the faithfull ought to be carefull to visit the poore in their afflictions, to the end that seeing with our eyes those that lie vpon strawe, that are sicke and naked, that shake for colde, that want breade, whose little children crie out for want of foode, and that are lodged in such places, wherein wee would hardly lay our dogges! such spectacles, I say, moue the inward parts of our hearts to haue compassion of them, that are in such miserable state, and to helpe them with our meanes.

That is it which Christ teacheth vs, when hee would haue vs not onely to supply the want of the poore with meate, drinke, and clothes, but also to visite them, auouching that to bee done to himselfe, that wee shall haue done to the poore and needie. For thus hee saith, I was sicke, and you visited mee. And Saint Iames sayeth, Pure Religion, and undefiled before God, euen the Father, is this, to visite the fatherlesse and widowes in their aduersities, to comfort them both by our wordes and our meanes, which giueth great force and efficacie to the word: and to speake plainly, hee that helpeth not the poore, hauing meanes to doe it, is a murtherer. For as a man puts not out a lampe onely by blowing, but also by not putting more oyle vnto it: and as wee put out the fire, by not supplying it with wood, as well as by throwing water vpon it: and as in an extreame hote Summer, many hearbes drie, not onely by cutting, and pulling them vp, but also for want of watering: So wee take away the life of man, not onely by killing him with a sword, or by doing other violence vnto him, but also by denying and refusing to giue him that which hee needeth to sustaine his life, As Saint Ambrose saith, That not to giue the poore that which they want, is as much as to kill them: Then let vs beware of burying their liues in our chestes and coffers, with our riches. If GOD by his providence giues vs more riches, then hee giues to other men, it is not to that end that wee should deuoure and hide them in our chestes, but to serue him as Ministers and Stewards to nourish, and to maintaine the poore: Which if wee neglect, their want, hunger, and nakednesse will crie vnto GOD, and accuse vs of ingratitude, and infidelitie: And hee as a iust Iudge, hearing their cryes, and therein beeing dishonored, dishonoured, will bee reuenged: for therein consisteth his glory, specially in this, that when wee supply the want of the members of his Sonne, Our charitie (saith the Apostle) causeth thanks to be giuen to G O D, by them, acknowledging the care that he hath of them, in that he giueth meanes and will vnto others to supply their necessities. 2. 5. Conclusion of this Chapter.

To ende this discourse, seeing that the summe and effect of the Lawe of God, is charitie out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith vnfaigned, (as Saint Paul saith, Let vs be clothed with this precious heauenly gift, and with this supernaturall vertue, which the eternall God our father distilleth into vs: that is, Charitie: That wee may be perfectly vnited and conioined vnto him, by loue, and by the same meanes to our neighbour, thereby to obtaine the perfection and beatitude, whereunto wee are called. 1. Tim. 1. 5.

And seeing that the promises are the foundation of faith, let vs meditate vpon them touching this point, that wee may be assured, that Charitie hath a great recompence before God, that all the daies of our liues wee may reape greater aboundance of fruite, calling to minde this sentence of the Apostle, That hee which soweth sparingly, shall reape also sparingly, and hee that soweth liberally, shall reape also liberally. And that which Saint Augustine saith, That the poore mans field is fertile, quickly yeelding, and in great aboundance, that which was sowed therein. And to speake troth, it is a fatte ground, readie tilled and prepared by the Lord, to receiue our seed: therein is neither Ice, nor drinasse, Catterpillar nor Locust, Haile, nor Armies of Souldiers, that can hinder vs from reaping the happy haruest which shall continue with vs for euer. For giuing to the poore, we lend vnto the Lord (saith the wise man) because it is Christ which demandeth his benefits of vs, as hauing giuen them vnto vs, to vse and dispose of them well, and yet in his great liberalitie, hee giueth himselfe as a pledge and surety vnto vs for them, with promise to restore them double vnto vs againe, and further to giue vs a great reward in heauen, for G O D taketh pleasure in such sacrifices. Therefore While wee haue time let vs doe good to all men, but specially vnto them which are of the household of Faith. According to the Apostles counsell, for if to day wee bee rich, the next day wee may bee poore: for that fire, warre, theeuies, and badde debtors, may bee meanes to bereaue vs of our goods. If the husband man knew that an armie of men were comming, hee would carrie as much of his wheate as he could out of his barne into the towne, and leaue it there with some friend of his, to keepe it safe for him. But wee are sufficiently aduertised and forewarned of a thousand dangers which are as it were at our heeles, to make vs by death lose, or soone leaue our goods, which by consequence should bee lost to vs. Then let vs giue vnto the poore according to our abilities, before we lose them, and by that meanes wee shall carry them, or at the least some part of them, to heauen, by the hands of those that aske of vs for Gods sake. And if in this manner we giue him our riches in keeping, he will offer vs them againe, in the great day of his glory, with life and eternall ioy. 2. Cor. 4. 6.

To leade a happy life, a Christian Philosopher must purge himselfe of seuerall pernicious vices, that is, Couetousnesse, Ambition, excesse of Apparell and meates, Voluptuousnesse, unlawfull pleasure, Envy, and slander. Chap. 12.

1. Reasons out of the holy Scriptures to make men enclined to holinesse, and righteousnesse.

IN the former Chapter you haue heard the reasons out of the holy Scriptures, which I ought to moue and incite vs, to give and incline our hearts vnto charity, as to the first and generall vertue of a Christian, and which in him is the cause of all good workes. Now wee must note and set downe thereasons of the same word, which serue to make vs loue holinesse and righteousnesse, that so we may see the commonest and principallest rules that therein are to be obserued by vs, to teach vs to leade our liues vertuously void of all vice. Which in truth is a most ample subiect, sufficient to fill a whole volume, for him that would write thereof at large. But as it hath bene said before, it shall suffice herein to shew some order, whereby a Christian man may bee ledde and conducted to a right ende and course, to order his waies in such sort, that hee may liue happely. To that purpose, that wee may first shew how the holy Scripture vseth a singular and most excellent method, to print in our hearts the loue of righteousnesse; wee may well say, that it could not lay a better foundation, then to tell vs, that we must be sanctified, because our God is holy. For so it is written, that the Lord spake to Moyse saying, Speake to all the Congregation of the children of Israel, and say vnto them, you shall bee holy, for I the Lord your God am holy. And Saint Peter to the same ende saith, As hee which hath called you is holy, so bee yee holy, in all manner of conuersation, because it is written, Bee you holy, for I am holy. To the which foundation agreeth, and is very conuenient, the exhortation which wee haue already noted to be given by Iesus Christ himselfe, and by his forerunner Saint Iohn Baptist, (saying, Amend your liues for the kingdome of God is at hand. For the finall ende and purpose of all these sacred Oracles is, that wee should purge our selues of all vices and all vncleannesse. Now there is nothing more difficult then to perswade and bring men to this point, that they should wholly put off the body of sinne, wherein they are borne, renouncing all carnall affections, to frame themselves to serue God holily. For they willingly rest and abide in their corruptions, and vncleannesse, ordinarily vsing an exterior maske and vaile of holinesse, and righteousnesse, to hide the vice which is within them. Then by good right and diuine reason, wee are called by the holy Ghost to this conformitie, that all the faithfull ought to haue with God, who by our adoption seeketh to restore and repaire his image in vs: that wee may beare it as it becommeth lawfull children, thereby to represent their Father. For although the most perfect, yea, the Angels, are farre off from making themselves equall in holinesse with God, (and to presume thereunto would bee a madde and senselesse enterprise or desire:) Neuerthelesse, the infirmities of the least Christians hinder them not to aspire vnto the example of God, and to approach neere vnto it, according to the measure of his grace, and as their capacities can beare it. For the ende of our vocation, (whereunto wee must alwaies haue regard, if we will make answer to G O D, and subsist before his face) is, That seeing hee hath separated vs from that body of sinne, to bee his people, wee must purge our selues of all pollutions, and vncleannesse of the world. For seeing that, as lost sheepe that haue gone astray, hee hath brought vs backe againe to the soueraigne Pastour of our soules, by the band of holinesse, wee must bee vnited to him, and by him to G O D, the King of Saints. That it belongeth to his glory to haue no familiarity nor acquaintance with iniquity and vncleannesse, and that hee hath vnited vs vnto him by Christ: wee must bee holy in all manner of conuersation: (saith Saint Peter) to the ende that no part of our liues should bee voide of that sweete fauour of holinesse. To the same foundation wee must bring this admonition of the Prophet, which is, If wee will dwell in the tabernacle of God, and rest in his holy mount, wee must walke vprightly, worke righteousnesse, and speake truth in our hearts. As Esay in his prophesie of the Ioy to come which the Church shall haue vnder the Messias saith. And there shall be a path and a way, which way shall be called holy, the polluted shall not passe by it: as we must also consider that the Scriptures to moue vs the more to this loue of righteousnesse, sheweth vs in diuers places, that as God reconciled himselfe vnto vs by the death of Christ his sonne, that suffered for vs; so he hath left vs an example and patterne, whereunto we must be conformable, by following his steppes. In such manner, that the same affection that was in him, should be in vs, and that as he hath done, we should doe. And to that end also the Scripture taketh occasion to exhort, and to tell vs, of all the benefits of God, & the parts of our saluation. When it saith, that we are the children of the Lord our God, that we may be a holy people and precious; and that wee should keepe his commandements. That in times past we were darkenes, but now are light in the Lord, That we might walke as children of the light, according to the fruits of the spirit, in all goodnes, righteousnes and truth. That whosoever hopeth to see God, must purge himselfe, as hee is pure. That our body is the temple of the holy Ghost, which we haue of God, & yet are not our owne, being bought for a price, that we glorifie God in our bodies and in our soules, which appertaine vnto him. That being redeemed from our vaine conuersation, by the precious blood of Iesus Christ, as a lambe vndefiled and without spotte, wee must purifie our soules, in obeying the truth, being regenerated by immortall seede, that is, the word of God which liueth and endureth for euer. That we are baptized and buried in the death of Iesus Christ, that we should cease from euil works, and walk in newnes of life, doing good works. That being raised with Christ, we should seeke those things that are aboue, and mortifie our members from all euill concupiscences & vncleannes. That we are in Christ to be new creatures and to make vs approoue in all things, as the seruants of God, by the armour of righteousness, on the right hand and on the left: abstaining from all apparance of euill, that both in body & soule, we may be kept blamelesse at the comming of our Lord Iesus Christ: thus many good and fit foundations wee haue, to teach vs to leade our liues orderly in holines and righteousness.

2. Generall rules out of the holy Scriptures, thereby to frame the life of a Christian, to all right conuersione and holinesse.

Now we must enter into the consideration of certaine rules, which the holy Scriptures prescribe vnto vs concerning the meanes how wee shall frame all our actions and workes according to the modell of that perfection, which God requireth to bee in his children. In the deduction whereof, wee will first begin with a speciall discoverie of the most vicious corruptions which wee must necessarily leaue, that we may not falsifie that name of faithfull Christians, which wee desire to keepe and preserue. For if wee be well perswaded to leaue and forsake vice, wee shall soone enter into the pathes of vertue. Wee haue already shewed what Saint Paul prescribeth vnto vs, touching the same, that is, To destroy and mortifie our bodies which are borne in sinne, to liue to God in Iesus Christ, and to giue our members as weapons of righteousness vnto God. And to cast off the olde man, to be renewed in the Spirit of our minde, by putting on the new man, to walke in holinesse and righteousness: which Iesus Christ calleth forsaking of our selues, which is in truth to be vnderstood, when mans heart is once moued to forsake himselfe, & to abandon pride, couetousnesse, intemperance, delights, superfluities, and all other vices, which are begotten by the loue of our selues; leauing his soule free without hinderance to serue God in humilitie and all good workes. As to the contrary, in all places where this forsaking of our selues is not, man easily runnes into all iniquitie and filchinesse; or at the least, if he retaineth some small apparance of vertue, it is alwayes corrupted with some desire of vaine glory. But the Apostle giueth vs another notable and generall instruction concerning a Christian life, wherein hee beginneth with these wordes, I beseech you brethren, by the mercie of God, that you giue vp your bodies a liuing sacrifice, holy and acceptable vnto God, &c. For there also hee goeth on with this exhortation, tending to this end, that the faithfull should not conform themselves to the world, but bee changed by an interior renewing of the minde, to hate all euill, and giue themselves to goodnesse. Which transformation or renewing of the minde, as Saint Paul saith, and which is the first entrance into a happy life, all the Philosophers were ignorant of, as also of the forsaking (aforesaid) of our selues, and the mortification of our bodies, to put on the newe man (all which things tend to one selfe same doctrine) for those wise men of the world onely taught, that reason ought to rule and moderate man, according to the precepts of honestie and vertue, which they could well declare and discover, being not able to fore or mount vp higher then to expound the dignitie and naturall force of man, when it was requisite to shew him what belongeth to his duerie. But to the contrary, the Christian Phylosopher will haue all our reason withdraw it selfe, & giue place to an interior regeneration, which is the proper work of the holy Ghost; that we may wholly be ledde by him, in such manner, that man liueth no more of himselfe, but hath Christ liuing and reigning in him. For so wee attaine to that vertue, when hauing forsaken our selues, and as it were destroyed and mortified all our naturall corruptions, wee become and are made new creatures, faithfully and truely to apply all our studies to follow God, and his commandements. And when the holy Scripture enioyneth vs to the forsaking of our selues, the intent thereof is, not onely to deface and pull out of our hearts, couetousnesse, insolencie, presumptions, and such like naturall corruptions, but also to roote vp all ambition, desire of humane glorie, and other such like poysons and pestilences which lie secretly hidden in our breastes. Which is as much to say, that a Christian man should bee so well disposed in minde, that hee should beleue and alwayes call to minde, that all his life time hee walketh before God, and that hee must yeeld an account vnto him of all his thoughts, wordes and workes.

and 11. 12.

To that end Saint Paul in an other place more distinctly setteth downe and disciphereth all the seuerall points belonging to a Christian, to order his life here on earth according to the vocation, age, and sexe of euery one, beginning thus: That the eldormen be watchfull, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in loue, and in patience, &c. And then proceeding in that manner to instruct all sorts of persons, hee saith, For the grace of God that bringeth saluation to all men, hath appeared, and teacheth vs, that wee should denie vngodlinesse, and worldly lustes, and that wee should liue soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Whereby wee see, how the Apostle draweth all our actions into three members or parts: whereof the first, which is Sobrietie, signifieth as well chastitie and temperance, as the pure and moderate vse of Gods gifts, and likewise patience in all aduersities. The second, which is righteousness, comprehendeth the vpright dealing that wee ought to vse, with, and towards our neighbours, to giue vnto euery man that which belongeth vnto him. The third, which is Godlinesse, purgeth and cleanseth vs from the polutions of the world, to vnite vs vnto God, to liue holily. And to say truely, when these three vertues are ioyned together by an inseparable band, they make an intire perfection. But because there is nothing more difficult in this terrestriall muddinesse or filthinesse, then to attaine to such an Angelicall life. The Ibidem 13.

Apostle Saint Paul, to comfort vs in our infirmities and weakenesse, and withall to teach vs to do, as much as in vs lieth, to vnburthen our soules of the bands of sinne, calleth vs to that blessed hope, which wee ought to haue of the apparition of the glory of our great God, and of our Sauour Iesus Christ; that is, at the comming to iudge the quicke and the dead, and where the fruits of the saluation which he hath procured for vs, shall appeare and manifestly be seene. Whereby it is certaine, that the Apostle seeketh to withdraw vs from all the allurements and inticements which are accustomed to dazell our eyes in this world, and to hinder vs from aspiring (as it is requisite) to that celest iall glory, and eternall happinesse, whereunto God by his grace hath ordained vs.

3. Seuen pernicious vices, whereof wee must purge our selues.
The first, Couetousnesse.

Now to apply these so excellent generall rules of all Christian righteousness, to our most dangerous corruptions. To deliuer vs from them, as we began the foundation of our Philosophy, vpon the foot or perfect number of seuen; so we will proceede in the same, by making it manifestly appeare, That it is the duty of a Christian, to purge his soule of seuen pernicious vices, which are couetousnes, ambition, excelsse of apparel, and meates, voluptuousnes, vnlawfull pleasures, enuy and slander. For the first, you must note, that couetousnes is a word which signifieth to desire or couet, which the Grecians call loue of money, or desire to haue more: neuer thelesse, it is very true, that all the desires and affections of the soule are naturally good, as nature it selfe also is, as it is created by God. But as it hath bene corrupted by sime, so it is corrupted in affections, by the disorder which the nature of sinne worketh therein. And to speake plainly, the first originall of coueting, is a faculty and a vertue of the will in man, by the which naturally he desireth good things, in such sort, that it is giuen him by God, to the end, that he should wish & seek for that which he thinketh to be good and profitable for him, and that having obtained it, he should hold and retaine it. Now forasmuch as God is the true and onely good of the soule, and that this good is infinite, it is not against nature, that the bredth, length, and deepenes of our desire or coueting, should be as it were infinite, and cannot be filled with any other thing whatsoever but onely with God: for it is naturall vnto vs to desire that good, and when our desire is filled therewith, then it will stay and rest it selfe. But as it wandreth and strayeth hither & thither, among terrestriall things, by the corruption of our nature, it neuer findeth end, nor contentment in her affections, but to the contrary, one begetteth another, whereof wee see and find an infinite number, which haue their particular names from the things which they most desire. For the desire of gold and riches, is called couetousnes; the desire of honours, ambition; that which passeth the bounds of lawfull coniunction between man and woman is called lechery, the excessive desire of meates and drinks, gluttony and drunkennes, and so of the rest. From thence it commeth, that when a man once begetteth couetousnes in his hart, to loue money without measure, with a desire to haue more then he hath, he becometh insatiable in his desire, alwaies greedy, alwaies thirsting, and alwaies burning with a feruent passion to increase his riches. That which he possesseth is to him as nothing, to aspire to that which he hath not. And because that which hee hath not is infinite touching man; so his desire is neuer satisfied. His purse and his chests may well be filled, but not his desire, which is bottomlesse, which maketh him neuer contented with that which he hath, thereby alwaies to torment and vexe himselfe in minde, to couet after that which hee enioyeth not. Therefore Anacharsis sayd, that a man which is couetous of money, is hardly capable of good counsell. And Socrates saith, that it is a hard matter to restraine the desire, and that he which coueteth after riches, is madde, because neither shame of the world, nor feare of death, can repress couetousnesse. Which corruption Esa lively describeth vnto vs, and withall pronounceth a curse vpon it, saying: Woe vnto them that ioyne house to house, and lay field to field, till there be no place to buy, that they may be placed by themselves, in the midst of the earth. For there the Prophet sheweth that couetousnes is so farre distant from faciety, that it spreadeth it selfe ouer all that whatsoever it can come by, to the ende not to leaue one foot of ground unpurchased, which it desireth to haue, as if a couetous man should possesse the whole world. It is a disease alwaies much more common then we think it to be, as experience hath at all times shewed, by the most pernicious fruites thereof. The Prophets likewise spake of it in their time, one saying; (Euery one looketh to their owne waies, and euery one to his owne desire.) An other sayth, (For from the least of them, vnto the greatest of them, euery one is giuen to couetousnes.) Our Lord & Sauour Iesus Christ and his Apostles reprocue and condemne that vice in many places. And Saint Paul notably foresheweth, and Saint Peter also, that in the latter daies, there shall be men that are couetous, Seducers and false Prophets, who through couetousnes shall make merchandise of our soules. It is most true, and worthy to be noted, that this vice contrary to the nature & condition of all other vices, which die and lessen with age, waxeth stronger in age, although it is a monstrous thing, that many couetous old men, haue nothing in them more vnreasonable, then this, that the lesse way that they haue to goe, or time to liue, they seeke to lade themselves with greater store of prouisiō, as if they had a long voiage in hand, or should liue euer. Which moued a Pagan to say, that the disease which lieth in mans veines, which is rooted in his bowels, and which growing old cannot be gotten away, is called couetousnes. Which also bringeth with it al other sorts of euils & miseries. For as the Apostle saith, That they that will be rich, fall into temptations and snares of the diuell, and into many foolish and nosome lusts, which draw men into perdition and destruction: that the desire of money is the roote of all euill, which while some lusted after, they erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrowes.

A Sentence in trueth, which ought onely to bee more then sufficient to make and persuade vs to leaue all couetousnesse. For seeing that as Christians, wee know that Satan is alwayes watching about vs, to cast vs headlong into sinne, and therefore daily pray vnto God, not to leade vs into temptation, what apparance or likelihood is there, that we would nourish couetousnesse, which maketh vs fall into the snares of the Deuill, to bee drawn into hell? Againe, what worsething can bee said of it, then to call this vice the roote of all euils & miseries, which plunge men ouer head and eares into ruine and perdition, making them fall from the faith? In it consisteth the fulnesse of all euill, because the end thereof draweth on it selfe the paines of eternall death. Then let vs truly say, that couetousnes is like the fire and the Anuill, wherewith the Deuill forgeth a thousand chaines of iniquity, to draw men into hell, and so many fiery darts to wound them deadly, by poysoning their hearts with the baits of all kinde of vices. Saint Bernard compareth couetousnesse to a Ladie sitting in a Chariot, the foure wheeles whereof, are as many vices, that is, despising or contemning of God, Inhumanitie, Defiance, and forgetfulnes of death: The two horses, niggardlinesse, and greedinesse, and the coachman, Couetousnes to haue. Saint Paul likewise calleth couetousnes, Idolatry; and the couetous man an Idolater. And our Lord Iesus Christ saith, that No man can serue two masters, (that is, God and riches) because hee will either hate the one, and loue the other, or cleaue to the one, and forsake the other. And in trueth the couetous man maketh an idol of his money, and to satisfie and serue his owne couetous desire, forgetteth his duetie towards God, and so doeth injury vnto him, but much more

to his neighbors, diuers wayes. For ordinarily hee wanteth no inhumane nor cruell inuentions and devices to draw other mens goods vnto himselfe, sparing no man, easily perswading himselfe, that other men are exposed vnto him as a prey to enrich himselfe thereby. Which made Saint Chrysostome properly call the couetous man, an enemy to all men: but which is worse, he is an enemy to himselfe, for that perpetually procuring trouble to himselfe, to get that which hee thinketh to be well gotten, he permitteth no rest nor quietnesse to himselfe, nor yet leasure to reape any pleasure of his owne riches.

But couetous men get and spend their riches, as if they should neuer die. They are like Mules, which carry great burthens of golde and siluer vpon their backs, and eate nothing but hay. They resemble a rich Ward or an Orphan, that dyeth young, before hee hath enioyed his patrimony. For in effect they are alwayes poore, and like him that hath nothing: and comparable to Tantalus, whom the Poets faine to bee in hell, and there dieth for hunger and thirst, liuing in the middle of great store of fruites, and water about him vp to the chin.

Matth. 6. 9.

To amend this accursed vice of Auarice, the fruitfull mother to man of many children, that make him an enemy to God, to his neighbours, and to himselfe. Let vs learne and be perswaded, that temporall riches, are so farre from giuing contentment, and making a man happie, that to the contrary they breed and ingender a thousand griefes, and cares in his soule, and therein serue for as many thornes therewith to choake all the seed, and roote of vertue, by their meanes making vs miserable and unhappie. Let vs consider that euery couetous man, that cannot bee content with his daily bread, but seeketh by all the meanes that hee can daily to encrease it, as many times as hee maketh that petition vnto GOD, in the Lords Prayer, hee plainly mocketh with God: seeking to hide his couetous affection; whereas to the contrary, true prayer should open and shewe the interior desire of the heart. Therefore the better to instruct vs, let vs remember that godlinesse is great gaine, if a man bee content with that hee hath. And that as wee are Christians, wee ought not to lay vp treasure for our selues vpon earth, where the moath and canker corrupt, and where theeues breake through and steale, but that wee must lay vp treasure for our selues in heauen: Imparting liberally of that which God giueth vs, to the poore, and bestow therest of our riches vpon good vses. For by that meanes, wee shall obtaine the fruites of Dauids Prayer, which is, Lord incline my heart vnto thy Testimonies, and not to conuersionesse.

Psal. 119. 36

4. Of Ambition, Pride, and Boasting or bragging.

For the second point we may well say, that among the desires or concupiscences which haue the greatest force in the soule of man, Ambition is one: which is an vnmeasureable lustie or seeking after honour, glory, and reputation. Which vice wee may truly describe to haue three faces. First, for that man not content with his state and condition, seeketh and desireth to be of greater authority and command. Secondly, when hee pretendeth to gette glory and reputation of men, presuming vpon some graces, that he hath receiued of God, more then others; which kinde of ambition, may properly be called pride, or arrogancy. Thirdly, for that many men say or do things, to seeme more then they are, or then they haue in their owne powers; which is called boasting or bragging. Now as we said in the precedent proposition, we must also consider two originall points, or first causes of all our affections: the one, of pure and entire nature; the other, of the corruption thereof; and so wee must and may say, as it is true, that ambition might well be in a man as a vertue, if he had not de generated from his creation, and had considered the excellency of his estate, and the great benefites which hee had receiued of God, specially in regard of his soule, by nature celestiall and diuine; for so he might haue continued in a holy pride, to desire to be made like to his creatour in goodnes, by the onely meanes which God had ordained, to maintaine him in the forme of his image; that is, in obedience, and for other things in such a degree as is conuenient for the creature. But our first parents giuing eare vnto him, who before had ouerthrowne himselfe by his owne pride, presuming not onely to bee equall with God, in goodnes, but also in power and greatnes, easily beleeued (by the liberty of their wil) the promise which that lier made vnto them, of an estate and condition higher and more excellent, then then that wherein God had created them. So Adam made according to the image of God, Gen. 1. 3. and ordained to bee Lord ouer all his other creatures, was not content therewith, but coveted and sought to bee greater, and to bee equall with God. At which time that false pride began to enter into him, by turning from the Lord, (whereof Ecclesiastes speaketh) which Eccles. 10. 14, 15. was the beginning of sinne. Which corruption hath in such manner corrupted his posteritie, that there is no one childe of Adam, which is not pricked forward and wounded with couetousnesse, to rise and climbe vp to a higher degree of honour and authoritie then hee hath; yea, if hee may to bee the highest, and (which is worse) not for the glory of God, or the good and profite of his neighbour, but onely to content his vaine desire, and to please his foolish and carnall affections. For as the couetous man is neuer satisfied with money, no more is the ambitious man with honour and greatnesse: because his vice will not permit him to remember from whence he came, and to what estate hee is exalted, but forcibly carrieth him to that which hee seeketh, and aspireth vnto. In such manner, that if he bee the second person in any high estate and dignitie, his onely and continuall thought is, how to eleuate himselfe aboue him that precedeth him therein. And if hee cannot make himselfe chiefe commander of a great kingdome, like the Prince himselfe, hee will at the least assay, to bee next vnto the person of the Prince, as Jonathan said to David, Thou shalt bee King of Israel, and I shall bee next vnto thee. As it is written, That the mother of John and James the Apostles besought Christ, that one of them might sit on his right hand, the other on his left in his kingdome. And in the Scripture one Diotrephes is said to haue sought the preheminance in the Church. And the Apostles disputed among themselves, who should bee the chiefe, and asked the Lord who should bee the greatest in the kingdome of heaven. So that there is no vice nor corruption whatsoever, which this couetousnesse of honour doth not beget, as such an elder daughter of the incredulitie of our first parents could not but bee a fruitfull mother of most wicked children. Whereof Saint Bernard maketh a notable description, saying, That Ambition is a secret poyson, a hidden plague, a forger of deceits, the mother of hypocrisie, the fountaine of enuie, the spring of all vices, the moath of holinesse, the blinding of the heart, and that which conuerteth wholesome medicines into diseases, and Physicke into languishing dolors: and likewise calleth it the ape of Charitie. For as that Christian vertue is patient, expecting eternall good, Ambition endureth all for temporall things. Charitie is fauourable to the poore, Ambition to the rich, Charitie endureth all for the truthes sake, Ambition for vanitie; there beeing no iniquitie nor crueltie, how great soeuer, whereinto Ambition will not thrust it selfe. What other thing but this pestilent vice onely moued Corath, Dathan, and Abiram to murmur against Moses and Aaron, and to raise that sedition which is spoken of in the holy Scriptures? Ahab to kill all the blood royall, to reigne Queene of Israel? Zimri and Omri, and many others to murder their Lords and Princes? Abimelech to massacre seuentie of his brethren the sonnes of Gideon? and Abshalom an hypocrite and an ingratefull childe, to drive his owne father out of his Kingdome, and to pursue him with an armie to put him to death?

The second kinde of Ambition, properly called Arrogancie or Pride, which is a swelling Of pride: of the soule, or of the heart, and proceedeth of an opinion in our selues, to bee endowed with giftes and graces more then others: prouoketh a man to commit true sacriledge against God, making man to attribute the glory of that vnto himselfe, which hee hath receiued from God, and therefore due vnto him. Which hee doeth two wayes, that is, in glorifying himselfe, and presumptuously esteeming of his owne person, because of the graces and giftes that hee hath, or at least thinketh to haue more then others: And againe, when hee seeketh, and with great desire receiueth glory of others, in such manner that hee reioyceth much, when it is given vnto him, and is angrie if any man denies it him. The true cause of this pride is, the inconsiderat loue that every one beareth vnto himselfe, which hindreth man to know himselfe. For if hee had that true knowledge, hee could not see any thing in his owne nature, but that onely which would cause him to despise, and humble himselfe: so farre off should he be from finding any thing therein, wherof to bragge and become proude: for as touching that which he may haue more then an other, by the speciall grace of God, he ought to hearken vnto Saint Paul speaking thus, for who separateth thee? 1 Cor. 4. 7. and what hast thou, that thou hast not receiued? and if thou hast receiued it, why reioicest thou, as though thou hadst not receiued it? And yet the Apostle confesseth, that hee himselfe had beene in danger to fall into a proud conceite more then became him, by the great-nes of the Reuealations that he had, If God had not preuented him. Whereby (as he saith elsewhere, that knowledge puffeth vp) he noteth how common this infirmity is to all men, to take an occasion to waxe proude, by reason of the encreasing of the gifts of God. And it is most strange, that it creepeth sometime into humility it selfe, and into all other vertues. For you shall see many men, who condemning pride, and other vices, without measure, to the vttermost setting out and affecting their owne modesty, and such like graces, take pleasure therein after a proud manner, and by such meanes fall into that pride, which they find falt withall, and blame in others. Whereby it appeareth how crooked and slippery this vicious serpent is, and into how many shapes it transformeth it selfe, to infect and poyson our hearts with his arrogancy, and withall corruptions. And yet it is most true, that if we put our miseries and vices in one scale, and all those excellent graces and merits which we presume and brag of in an other scale; the counterpoise of abiection will weigh downe all our glory and make vs blush for shame and confusion.

Let vs only weigh our ignorance against our knowledge, our want of vertue, against our perfection, our sinnes against our righteousness, and our corruption against our holines, and it will be more then enough to abate all the Pride and presumption wherewith our minds are infected. It is said, that the peacocke having so many beautifull feathers, and but two feete onely, taketh a great pride to behold her taile when shee spreadeth it abroad, and that as soone as she looketh vpon her feete, and sees them to be so ill favoured, presently she leaues her pride, & lets fall her taile, seeming as it were to hide that, which before she thought to be very faire and beautifull. How much more ought wee by the feeling and apprehension of diuers filthy feet which sustaine vs in vice, (that is our corrupt and peruerse affections,) to humble our selues, and to beate down the pride and arrogancy which liueth in vs, of things which are lighter then feathers: that is our owne naturall inclinations, which haue onely a beginning and an appearance of beauty? for as touching supernaturall & diuine graces, how much the more they abound and increase in vs, so much the more we are bound in all humility of heart, to giue honour to God, and to vse them all to his glory, without making idols of our selues, by sacrificing to our nets, and burning incense to our yearne, as the Prophet saith. We see that when the sunne shineth directly over our heads the shadowes of our bodies are but short and little, which by experience wee finde to bee true about noone time, and a little before and after noone. So there ought to be lesse pride and presumption in vs, when the sonne of righteousness with great force casteth down the beames of his gifts and graces vpon our soules.

Habac. 1. 16

Boasting.

Touching Boasting and bragging, which is the third common effect of Ambition, there are some men so foolish in this respect, and in such manner carried away with the desire of glorie & praise, therby to nourish and feed their pride, that the lesse matter that they haue in themselves to bee proud of, so much the more they boast and bragge: in such manner, that their vauntings are certaine signes and testimonies of their indignitie and miserie. For as it is a signe that the Sunne descendeth and goeth downe from vs, when the shadowe of our bodies waxe and grow long: so wee may holde it for a certaine and true argument, that vertue decreaseth in that man, in whom wee see presumption to encrease, by his boasting and bragging. And as wee iudge a vessell to bee full, by the little sound that it giueth, when wee knocke vpon the head thereof; and when it sounds hollow, that is a signe that it is empty: so we may well beleeeue, that in such men as take great paines to make their valour and merits sound high, there is more wind and vntruth, then truth & effect of vertue in them. They are like to pedlers, who out of their little packs willingly shew every man all that they haue; where to the contrary, marchants hang out but small musters of the rich wares and marchandises which they haue in their great warehouses. And as eares of corne when they hang down their heads, ordinarily are full & well grained, but those that stand vpright and highest, make men gesse that they are light, and haue little or nothing in them. So we commonly see, those that are humble and modest, are as much replenished with all laudable conditions, as braggers and glorious boasters are vnfurnished thereof, and want them. And as experience sheweth vs, low vallies are commonly fertile, and to the contrary, the higher that hils are, so much the barrener they are.

Againe, we must consider, that such braggers & boasters commonly bereaue themselves of more glory and commendation, then they get by their vauntings, for presently they discover themselves to be liars, for although they speake truth, yet they make themselves odious to the world, by praising and commending themselves, whereby that happeneth vnto them them both in the one & the other, which we naturally see by experience, that a shadow runneth away from him that followeth it, & followeth him that goes from it. To correct & amend this kind of ambition, let vs remember the great number of the pernicious effects of this vice, and the horrible vengeance which God hath alwayes taken of ambitious & proud persons. How fearfull was his iudgment vpon Adam and Eue, because of the sin whereinto they fell by this concupiscence. And what punishment did he lay vpon Aman, Athaliah, Abſalon, Nebuchadnezzar, and Herod. Let vs thinke vpon those iudgements which the holy Ghost hath pronounced, That God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble: that whosoever will exalt himselfe, shall be brought low, and whosoever will humble himselfe, shall be exalted. That God scattereth the proud in the imagination of their hearts, and exalteth them of low degree. To be short, let vs despise all the glory of the world, which is nothing else, but as it were a blast of winde, or a little smoke. And if among worldly men, wee are held to be abjects, and contemptible in this world, in this life, (which is of so short a continuance) let vs bee content and comfort our selues in that we are great, rich and full of glory before God, in his Son Iesus Christ, being his children, and heires of his kingdome. Finally, let vs learne, that humility is the foundation of Christian Phylosophie, and of all commendable vertues: and that as our humble behaviour in all things is the glory of God, the only efficient cause of our good: so the confession of our indignity, hath for reward his mercy & goodnes. And yet we must not bee proud or vaine glorious thereof, but only in this, that by our humbleness we haue learned wholly to depend vpon our Father which is in heauen, to be new creatures in the Lord.

5. Of excesse of apparell, and meates, and of drunkennesse.

Consequently, and for the third kind of our greatest corruptions, we must note, that the desire of vaine glory sheweth it selfe in 2. other principal things, besides those before rehearsed, that is, in sumptuousnes of apparel, & ornaments of the body, & in superfluity & excesse of meates & drinks, which vanities haue need to be reformed in vs. For the first point, every man cannot chuse but confesse in conscience, that the ordinary excesse in apparell & ornaments of the body, proceeds from a foolish desire that we haue to be of great account among men. It is true that there are three things much esteemed in the world, that is, nobility, riches & beauty, (specially in women & maids) which is the cause why every man will be accounted to be rich, or noble; & for women, either they would be, or at least thought to be faire. And because costly ornaments & sumptuous apparel, are means to encrease the apparance, shew, and reputation of riches, beautie, and nobilitie, from thence specially it proceedeth, that every one exceedeth in this corruption. The Artificer goes like a Merchant, the Merchant like a Gentleman, the Gentleman like a Prince, and so every one raiseth his estate, and in truth goes beyond it, to excel and surpass others of the same and the like quality. Whereby the curiositie and superstitie thereof is such and so great, that there must be an excesse, either in the price of the stuffe, that they may weare the finest, and consequently the dearest; or in the qualitie thereof, as wearing silke in stead of woollen cloth, or in broad gards, or els 4. or 5. gards one by another, or els in new fashions, accompanied with superfluity & vnseemlines, as in ruffes, cuffes, coiffes, caulcs, and other foolish, worldly & fleshly inuentions. Whereof women are such curious mistresses of art, that the greatest part of them openly shew, all their study and care almost to be, how to dresse their bodies, and to tire their heads: which is no new thing, for in the Prophet Esaies time, The women of Iudea ware ornaments vpon their slippers, or shoes, chaines, bracelets, necklaces, claspes, buckles, spangles, rings, tires, Jewels, and carcanets of gold, Jewels hanging one their foreheads, mantles, loose frockes, vailcs, bodkins, looking glasses, curled and frised haire, and locks pulled, and laid out, and hanging downe by their eares. Which vanities many women and maides in these daies vse, and often surpass them, and which is worse some are not content with the colour which God hath giuen them, and to wash their faces with pure water, to make them cleane, but vse artefical waters, mixt and composed with colours, therewith to looke whiter or redder in their faces, then they are, and to shew (as they thinke) of a greater beautie in them then euer God made. Now as this folly and kind of sacriledge, was in the time of Iesabel and by succession hath bin, & continued in all those that haue not refrained to follow her steps, although dogs did eat Iesabel her & her paintings: so the holy Fathers sharply blamed such corruptions. S. Augustin expressly wrot a whole treatise thereof. And Tertullian having shewed that God created no painted or counterfeit colored men asketh if they thought to rise again at the latter day with their faces painted and artificially coloured. Which being valikely, he strictly exhorteth women, to abstaine from it, as from things cleane contrary to their creation & resurrection, calling them seruants of the deuill which do the contrary. S. Cyprian confirmeth the same by a similitude, saying, If a painter hauing made an image or picture, another should come, & seeking to mēd his work, wold put other colours vpon it, he wold be angry & offended therat. How much more the, saith he, may our Creator be angry, if a mortal man taketh on him by painting, to correct the image of his God? S. Chrys. saith, that women which paint themselues, are like to those that put dirt and filth vpon a painted or golden image. And S. Ierome calleth it a reproching of God, because he made them not faire enough. And to the same purpose reciting a story of a woman that was plagued by the hand of God, because she had painted her daughter, he addeth, that those that vse it, violate the temple of the holy Ghost. In another place calling such painting, fires which inflame youth, nurseries of lechery, & signes of an vnchaste heart. But to return to our purpose, of pomps & superfluities in apparel, we are all found guilty of great excesse therein, & too common among vs, & for that cause euery onespeaketh, complaineth and crieth out therof, and say that they can see no amendment therein; that it is still worse & worse, that it deserueth a great punishment, & that God wil punish vs for it: which are as many iudgments registred in heauen against vs, which we shal once feele (if they be not already laid vpon vs) when God proceedeth to the execution: for besides that those which loue such foolish expences, & to their shame & confusion, consume their goods, which they ought to imploy in charitable works, oftentimes they imploy other mens goods therein, & somtimes the substance of the poore, which many of them get into their hands by vnlawful means, for which cause many times, seditions, ciuil wars, tyrannies, & cruelties are moued, begun, & executed in commonwealths, towns & states, to the end that such stuards desirous of vain glory, & fishing in troubled waters, may haue the better meanes to maintaine their pomps and braueries. But that is far from the dutie of christians, whom God in his word commandeth to seeke peace, as also not to forget, that they are instituted & ordained by his diuine authoritie, not to be lords, but stuards of the goods that he giueth them, vpon condition to yeeld an account thereof, and to vse them in such sort, that being modestly clothed & fed, they should with the rest help the poore & needy. It is not without cause, that Iesus Christ foretelleth vs of the iudgment which he wil pronounce at the latter day, which is, Depart from me ye cursed into eueralsting fire: for I was hungry, and ye gaue me no meat; I thirsted, and ye gaue me no drinke, I was a stranger, and ye tooke me not in to you, I was naked, and ye clothed me not, and in prison, and ye visited mee not. In which sentence there is enough contained to make all those quake for feare, whose excesse in apparell would largely suffice to cover the nakednesse of many poore members of Christ: of whom they make little or no account at all. And yet they are their own flesh and blood (as Esay saith) which they are bound to clothe and cover. Besides this, they shew themselues to be altogether ignorant of the maner and quality of the apparell which God made for our first parents Adam and Eue in Paradise, and also of the cause why that apparell was made. For it is certaine, that their clothes were made of beastes skinnies, to teach them that in their fall and transgression of Gods commandements, they were become like poore beasts, and that the shame they had to see themselues naked by sin, was the cause to make them seeke for clothes. And so the first vse of clothes is a manifest reproch vnto vs of sinne, to humble vs before God: And no cause to make vs glorie in our apparell, but to the contrary, they are as it were a fading or withering state of death ordained to fall vpon our forefathers and vs, because of the ambition and pride of Adam and Eua, seeking to make themselues equall with God. In such maner, that the onely, beholding or looking vpon our apparell ought to put vs in minde, to renounce and forsake all pride and vanitie, and to seeke to cloth our bodies honestly, to hide our shame, and not sumptuously to encrease it. The second vse of our apparell is, to keepe and preserue vs from colde, raue, and heate of the Sunne, wherein also there is no subiect or matter ministered vnto vs, to be proud, but rather to make vs humble, putting vs in mind of the wrath of God against sinne: for if man had not offended God in Paradise, neither heat nor cold should euer haue hurt him. Then let vs remember Christs exhortation to amend our liues, let vs forsake and detest excesse and pride of apparell, beginning at the reformation of our hearts. For as euery sort of seede produceth herbes or fruits according to the kind, so the heart (as the nurserie of the affections of the soule) being humble and modest, will be the cause to make vs weare and put on the like apparell, as to the contrary, an ambitious and proud heart, cannot but delight and take pleasure in pomps, pride of apparell, and other vanities. And let vs knowe that it is a great folly and

extreme iniquity for vs, to haue more care of the garnishing of our bodies, then of the ornaments of our soules. But as the body is more & dearer vnto vs then our clothes, & that many times we sel & pawn our apparel, to feed or heale the body, if need require. So we ought to abandon al affection & desire to clothe our bodies richly, that we may the better benefit our soules. Humility, holines, chastity, and charity, are the precious ornaments of the soule, wherunto nothing is more contrary then pride & ambition: which shew themselves in the excesse & superfluity of exterior apparel. Again, if it be a common thing among vs, that we haue great care to weare better apparel then ordinary, when we are bidden to a banquet, or to an assembly of honorable personages, where we are to be & conuerse with our equals: what ought we to do in the behalf of our soules, by the which through faith here on earth, we conuerse with God, and his holy angels all the daies of our liues (if wee liue like true christians) that when we die, we may be ready, and effectually be receiued into that celestial company in heaven? It should bee as it were an overthrowing of all good order, if not thinking vpon this difference, we take more care to adorn & beautifie that which is exterior & mortal, then that which is interior & immortal. Let vs rather follow S. Peters exhortation, which he directeth to women, & toucheth men also, that is, Whose apparelling let it not be that outward, with broidred haire, & gold about, or in putting on of apparel, but let it be the hidden man of the heart, which consisteth in the incorruption of a meeke and quiet spirit, which is before God a thing much set by. Or as S. Paul saith, Likewise also the women, that they array themselves in comely apparel, with shamesfastnes & modesty, not with broidred haire, or gold, or peale, or costly apparell, but as becometh women that profess the feare of God with good works. To be short, let vs so renounce all our ambitious vanities, that every man according to his quality (not imaginary, but true) that is, as his state & condition requireth, and can beare it, apparelling himself modestly, may shew by effect that he feareth God, and desireth to edifie others. For if Pithagoras did so much by his instructions, that the women in his time (beeing infidels) left off their iewels, and other costly ornaments, as seruing only for instruments of folly, and incontinency, and learned from him, that their only and speciall ornament was chastity; wee ought much more to feare to wrong Iesus Christ our soveraign doctor and great master, in such maner, that his authority & doctrine should not take place among vs that are christians, to make vs leaue & forsake our vanities & follies.

Touching the other point, wherein also appeareth a couetous desire of vaine glory, that is in feasts and banquets, it is manifest, & well known to all men, that there is no banquet, no nor any ordinary meale made by many men, wherein there is not superfluity & excesse. Neuertheles, we know that meats & drinks are given vnto vs by God for two special purposes; the first, to nourish & sustain vs, that by food our bodies receiuing force & vigor (which we properly call refection) we may apply our selues to serue God, every one in that vocation wherunto he hath called vs. But to the contrary, we commonly see, that our meales for the most part, serue to make vs vnfit for our vocation, our bodies by long sitting at the table, and the abundance of feuerall meats, becoming so heavy & out of order, that rising from our meals, we are fitter (like hogs) to lye down to sleepe, then disposed (like Christians) to do our duties to God, specially in regard of reading his word, giuing him thanks, & praying vnto him. So that therby we rather destroy and kill, then feed and nourish our bodies. Whereas if we had a regard and care to eate and drinke soberly, and necessarily, our bodies would bee in better temper, and our soules so much the more and better disposed to their proper actions. Sobrietie is the mother of health, and the nurse of vertue; for the Spirit is alwayes apt to comprehend that which it professeth, when the braines are not troubled by vapours, which the superfluities of meats send into the head. A Pagan was wont to say, that if the greatest & soveraign good of man, is to haue no need of nourishment, it is manifest that the next good therunto, is to need or vse but a litle. Another sayd, that when we sit down to meate, we must make account that we are to feed 2. gesses, the body & the soule, and that all the meate which we put into the bodie, presently passeth through it, without any great profit, but that which is good, (as wise discourses, & prudent thoughts) entreteth into the soule, & staies therein to a profitable vse. To this purpose a grecian captain hauing suppt with Plato in his scholl where he had but a sober & a smale meale, (for the greatest banquets which the wisemen in those times vsed, were only made with olives, cheese, apples, coleworts, bread & wine, said that those which suppt with Plato, were sure not to be ill at ease the next day, nor long time after. For it is true, that they ordinarily met together at supper & dinner without any excesse of meates, not to fill their bellies, but to refresh their minds & spirits, and to learne instructions one of the other, by notable discourses of Philosophie, which concerne the arte and science of liuing well. And it is to be noted and specially considered, that in the holy Scriptures, we find that our first parents for a long time, lived, and fed themselves only with fruits, milk, meale and water. And who could ever after their times, approach neere, or attaine vnto the long and happy dayes and ages which they liued? What preparation or store of daintie meates might the Israelites (being sixe hundred thousand men that came out of Egypt) looke for, or expect to carry with them, when they went into a strange countrey, beeing 40. yeares on their iourney in the deserts, and therein drinking nothing but water, and many times could find none? The other end and vse of eating and drinking, is to praise God, and to extoll his

1. Cor. 10. 31 goodnes & liberality toward vs. To the which end, S. Paul saith, Whether you eat or drinke, or whatsoeuer you doe, doe all to the glory of God. But where is there one among vs, when he eateth and drinketh, that is moued in heart to say with David, Lord thou art good and gracious. And

Psal. 119. 68. in how many bankets do men take occasion or subiect to enter into an acknowledgment or any discourse of the graciousnes, mercy and power of God, author of al goodnes? But rather consume and passe the time away in vaine and foolish talke, or else to welcoms one the other, and to moue and presse them to eat and drinke. Plato, Xenophon, and other Philo-

Plut. Simpos. li. 1. sopers, were of aduise, that it was a commendable and profitable thing, to gather and to keep a record of such discourses, and speeches as should be spoken and made, when men were at a banquet, or at a great feast. But if that were practised among vs that are Christians, such regifters for the most part would bee filled with narrations, so vnworthy our profession, that prophane persons would be ashamed to vse the like when they were at meat. For in truth, in our bankets ordinarily there are no discourses of learning or godlines, but only a maner of merry & pleasant intertainment, altogether fauoring of the world, & oftentimes too much of the flesh. And to fill vp the measure of excessse, Drunkennesse is the next point, so much

Drunkennes. vsed in these daies, that it is become a vice almost without remedy. For now we thinke wee haue not made our ghests good cheere, nor bidden them sufficiently welcome, if we moue not all the company at the table, as it were by constraint to drink more then they desire, & in many places & countries, til they be drunk. That is it wherof some make great brags and vaunts (as if they gloried therein) how much they haue drunk, & how they made their companions drunk. Some haue glasses without feet, that men cannot set them down out of their hands, til they haue drunk al out, & some haue litle bells hanging at their cups, by the ringing therof to shew their valor in drinking al out. Some proceed further, & haue a die placed and closed in the foot of the cup, which whē they stir it, he that drunk last is bound to drink again, or some other of the company, according to the nūber of the points that shalbe found vpon the die, whē it hath bin shakt. A deuillish inuētion without doubt, if euer there was any, in such maner to profane the prouidence of God, & the vse of wine, so excellent a creature, applying it by lots or chance to drunkennes. Again, there are many other like acursed means vsed for the same purpose, as meats expressly prepared by art, which are caled shoinghorns for wine, to force & constrain men to drink without thirst, till they be drunk. And yet the inconueniences which happen therby, are so apparant, noisome, and so wel noted by Pagans, that it is a monstrous thing, that there should be Christians found that do not abhor, nor are not ashamed of so detestable & pernicious a vice, as drunkennesse is. For to say truth, there is no vice more contrary to the excellency of the creation of man endued with vnderstanding & reason: for by means of that excessse, he loseth the vse of vnderstanding, reason, & iudgment. Again, how can it be the light of vnderstanding which maketh him differēt frō brute beasts when wine bereaueth him both of sense & reason, & taking man frō man, placeth him among the ranck of beasts, as it is plainly confessed by a drunken Proverb, That some drunkards are like apes, some like hogs, & some like lions. As experience sheweth, that some being drunk are like apes, for foolish toies & light behauiours: others sleep & wallow in their vomiting like hogs. And others quarrell & brawle, wrangle, & fight like lions. And we may well say, that all drunkards are true Lyons to themselves, because they do iniury to themselves, waste their goods, & consume both bodie and soule. Therefore a Pagan said, that drunkennesse is a voluntary fury. And an ancient father saith, it is a wonder, that the bodies of drunkards, which by nature are of earth, being so much discepred with drinking, do not consume to filth & dirt, but that the soule serueth the in a maner for salt, to keep their bodies for a time from rotting. And certēly, the excellēcy of the spirit in Christians, serueth to meditate vpon things that belong to God, & there is no exercise that can be more comodious & profitable for the, nor wherein the Lord is more glorified, the in praier, praising & giuing thanks vnto God. But drunkennes wholly abolisheth the vse thereof, as also of the reading, & hearing of the word of God. For if being sober and fasting, often times and too much, wee fall asleepe when wee heare it; there is nothing to be expected of drunkards but onely a meere beastly senselesnes, which wholly depriveth them of the profit of diuine doctrine. For as a great continuall raine (saith Saint Augustine) moistneth and soaketh the earth, and makes it so boggie, that it can not bee laboured, nor plowed to bring forth fruit: so our flesh drunke by ouer great abundance of wine, is not capeable to receiue spirituall tillage, nor to beare fruits fit and conuenient for the immortall soule. And therefore we must take heede, that our bodies to much distempered, and as it were drownd in wine, become not like marshes, wherein there growes and breeds nothing but weedes, frogs, snakes, and such like creatures. Oh great wickednes in humane kinde (saith this ancient Father in an other place) that we should oftentimes presse and force men that are full already, to drink more then needs, & refuse to giue a cup of water to a poore body, begging it at our dore: Sitting at the table we say (to those that are full vp to the throat) you are not merry, you eate nothing, to haue them eat more, and refuse a morsell of bread to a poore hungrie man. Wee speake to our guests whom the abundance of sweet wine and dainty meats (but too much prouoke them) bidding them make good cheere and bee meery; and forget them, that wanting bread for themselves, and their children, sigh, mourne and weepe. Oh great Sacriledge (saith Saint Ierome) in such sort to giue the goods of the poore, to those that are not poore. The Drunkard (saith Saint Chrysostome) is a voluntarie Diuell, guilty and inexcusable of his owne ruine and decay. And Saint Augustine saith, That drunkenness is an amiable diuell, a dainty poison, and a sweet sinne. Saint Paul telleth drunkards, That they shall not inherit the kindome of heauen. And to shew how much wee should abhorre this vice, hee forbiddeth vs to keepe company with those, that professing the Gospell, are adicted to drunkenness.

Of necessitie (saith an ancient Father) we must be in company of those, with whom wee meet in a ship or in the warres, but to be conuersant with euery man to eat & drink, it is not the part of a wise and vertuous man. If a Pagan Phylosopher could make answer to Antigonius, and said (when he asked his aduice and counsell what he should doe, being bidden to a banquet where certaine insolent women should come) that he should remember that he was a kings son; therby aduertising him, to beware of dishonest company, and so to shun all occasion of euil: how much more ought we to remember, that we are the children of the king of heauen, his royal priesthood, his holy nation, and his free people. That we may abstaine from fleshly lusts, which fight against the soule, and therefore must not haunt any company whatsoever, to feast, drinke, or doe any thing that may any way tend to disorder, riot, or excessse? But it may be some will say, Is it vnlawfull for vs when we are at feasts and banquets, to speake of other things then of God, and to serue him? or must wee neuer make banquets, and feast our friends? Therunto I say, there is great difference between alwayes and neuter; that nothing hindreth vs from recreating our selues together, with seemely speeches, and modest mirth, wel becomming a christian life, & that God permitteth vs to make feasts and banquets, according to the examples therof found in the holy Scriptures, which also we doe not restraine to a strict maner of eating bread & herbs, and drinking water, nor yet to halfe an hower time. God hath created good meats, and sweet & delicate wines, to vse them for our food & necessity, but we must alwaies vse sobriety and honesty, in such maner, that our feasts may be seasoned with christian discourses, and that therin we vse no excessse in abundance, curiositie of meats, nor sitting long time at the table. And at such times specially we must remember the poore & needie, and that which Iesus Christ to that purpose saith; Therfore giue almes of those things which you haue, and behold, all things shall be cleane to you. For therby he sheweth, that our meats vpon our tables, and all the goods that we haue shall be vncleane, if while wee enioy great plentie of wealth, wee haue no care nor desire to bestowe a part thereof on them that want: let vs therefore spare, as much as we can of our abundance and superfluitie to helpe the poore. To the which end also in an other place he exhorteth vs at our feastes and banquets, not to invite the rich that can bid vs againe, but the poore, the maimed, the lame, and the blinde, which haue nothing to giue vs againe, and saith, that wee shall bee blessed in so doing, and sure to be recompensed at the resurrection of the Iust. As also he admonisheth vs to take heed to our selues, lest at any time our hearts bee suppressed with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, lest the latter day come vpon vs vnawares, and suppress vs to our vtter destruction.

seek mixt wine: which goeth downe pleasantly, but in the ende thereof it will bite like a Serpent, and hurt like a Cocatrice. And let vs learne this sentence of Esay, Woe unto them that rise vp care-ly to follow drunkenesse, and to them that continue untill night, till the wine doth inflame them, and the Harpe and Viol, the Timbrel and Pipe, and wine are in their feasts, and regard not the Worke of the Lord, neither consider the worke of his hands. Let vs vse wine soberly, for the preseruati-on of our health, (as Saint Paul exhorteth his Disciple) by that sweet liquour, taking occa-sion to praise God for his bountie, and not to abuse it, and so to offend him that created it. Aboue all things being carefull to be filled with the holy Ghost. To bee short, let vs drive from our banquets and feasts, all excesse, proceeding of ambition and vaine glory, and from that foolish desire to bee esteemed rich, and liberall in such vanities, more then o-thers: thereby not to incur the disgrace of pouertie or nigardlinesse. Let vs rather seeke for reputation in sobrietie and affection, to giue a good example to our neighbours: that so changing vice into vertue, wee may altogether (in the aboundance of the blessings of God) acknowledge his great liberalitie toward vs, to his honour and glory.

6. Of Pleasure, Adultery, and Lecherie.

Touching pleasure and voluptuousnesse, which we also set among the most pernicious vices: it is certaine that all the affections which God hath placed in mans nature, tend vn-to as many good, proper, and conuenient things, whereof he may obtaine the possession and fruition, and in them pleasure and delight, and that his affections are giuen vnto him, as goades to prick him forward, and to induce him to seeke after God his soueraigne good, in whom onely hee may finde true ioy and entire pleasure. But as those affections haue beene depraued by sinne, so they produce effects contrarie to their originall, and with great difference betweene naturall men, and those that are renewed by the holy Ghost. Now it is not alwaies true, that voluptuousnes or delight is an ease, which the heart taketh, in the enioying of that good which is conuenient and fit for it, nor that euery man may receiue pleasure and ioy in all parts both of the body and of the soule, as well by the interior as the exterior senses, as every one is more or lesse addicted to one, or diuers of those parts, and taketh more pleasure in the delights that he may receiue by them. For wee see that the meaner and common sort of people, and those that are the rudest, and the ignorantest, are more moued, and take greater delight in corporall and exterior things, which concerne the bodily senses; then in spirituall things, which are of a higher qualitie, and more con-uenient for the Spirit, and wherein they may receiue more delight. But men that are wise and prudent, know well how to embrace the one, and to leaue the others. But the subiect of our proposition leadeth vs here to speak of the most vile and abiect pleasure of all others, which is receiued by the sense of feeling: against the which generally, there are an infinite number of notable sentences, set downe by the Pagans and infidels, whereby with the common consent of all the world, this false pleasure and delight is blamed and con-demned, as most dangerous, most pernicious, and altogether vnworthy of man.

Architas apud
Cic. in li. de Senct.

One saith, That there is no deadlier plague then voluptuousnesse, that it is the spring and originall of treasons, and the ruine of common wealths, there beeing no enterprife so wic-ked, whereunto man is not pricked forward and prouoked by this vice. Plato calleth it the fishbooke of all evils: for by sweet delights and pleasures, men are taken and carried into all miseries, and put to death, like fishes caught by the fishbooke, when it is covered with a bait, saying further, That it continually procureth hurt to man, and ingendreth griefe, folly, forgetfulnesse of wisdom, and insolency in his minde. Plutarch saith, That pleasure dis-solueth mans body, and softeneth it by delights, mortifieth his strength, and decayeth his force: from whence proceedeth abundance of diseases, and is the cause that wee see the be-ginning of weake old age to appeare in yong men. An other Pagan saith, It is a cruel beast, which makes men slaues, and tieth them fast in chaines of Diamants. An other, That pleasure and griefe are twinnes, whereof the first is no sooner borne, but the other present-ly followeth, and holdeth it as it were by the heele, to supplant it, and to change pleasure into repentance. An other compareth it to a white sepulchre, or toombe, faire without, but full of infection and stinking deadly saueur within. An other, to a strong poyson mixt with hypocras or milke, as in trueth voluptuousnesse poysoneth man in such sort, that it killeth reason and vertue in his soule, and health in his body.

But if all these sentences aforesaid were said by Pagans and Infidels, that onely regarded naturall naturall man; and this present life, how much more ought this vice to bee detested by the children of God, regenerated by his holy Spirit, and in regard of eternall life? It is the cares of the world (saith Iesus Christ) that hinder them which haue heard the Gospel preached, to bring forth fruit. And Saint Paul also meaneth the same, when hee saith, They that are in the flesh, cannot please God: That he which liueth in pleasure, is dead, while hee liueth. Wherefore it becommeth the faithfull, not to take care for the flesh to fulfill the lustes thereof. Then let vs beware of so dangerous an enemy as pleasure is; let vs flie the occasions that may moue vs thereunto, and such companions as are addicted to it: For as greene wood laid on the fire, will not burne at the first, yet at the last it burnes and consumes. So it is with him that haunteth and keepeth company with riotous and voluptuous fellows, hee may for a time resist and forbear from euil; but in the end he plungeth therein, and sinketh ouer head and eares.

Luke 8.14.
Rom. 8.8.
1. Tim. 5.6.
Rom. 13.14.

To that ende let vs shunne and auoyd Idlenesse, as the true mother of voluptuousnesse, as a Pagan saith, That doing nothing, wee learne to doe euill: and that as by continuall labour, concupiscence decreaseth; so by idlenesse it increaseth. Standing puddle waters easily corrupt, and so doe idle men. But specially let vs consider, that nothing is more contrary to amendment of life, in Gods children; nor to the sighes and teares (required of them by the holy Ghost) for the bewayling of their sinnes and corruptions, then carnall pleasures. For as it is a thing contrary to nature, to light fire in water: so it is monstrous, that voluptuousnesse and pleasure should breed in a sorrowfull and greeued heart for his sinnes. When the holy Scripture calleth vs to a solemne acknowledging and feeling of our iniquities, it exalteth vs to fast, to weepe, and to mourne, and saith, Let the bridegrome goe forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her bedchamber.

Ioc. 1.12.16.

Therefore let vs submit our selues to the wholesome aduertisements of the holy Ghost, indeuouring our mindes to tame and pull downe our rebellious flesh, and to quench the fire of concupiscences, by fasting, weeping & prayer to the Lord. And so we shall triumph ouer that monster voluptuousnesse: for it is true, that when the flesh is extenuated and kept low, it sharpneth the forces of the spirit, conuerteth the vigor of the body into the vertues of the soule, restraineth the carnall marrow thereof, from casting out stinking and villanous exhalations, keepeth the secret prouocation hidden in the intrailles from heating the braines, and preserveth the senses, alienated from their right functions, from lusting after that villanous pleasure which inciteth and prouoketh them thereunto, and which li- deth and passeth away as soone as it is borne: that so the spirit onely may take her rest, and sole delight, in the meditation and enioying of the supercelestial good, which is conuenient and fitte for it, and reioyce that it hath vanquished and overcome her greatest aduersary the flesh. But all that which we haue formerly said, beeing generally spoken of voluptuousnesse, we must now shew the particular kindes thereof. The holy Scriptures speaking of the monstrous corruption of men, worse then beasts in this respect, setteth downe such abhominable kindes therof, that chaste hearts would abhorre to heare them named, and therefore we will leaue to speake of such sinne against nature, for the which the persons guilty, were vtterly to be rooted out of the earth, by the law of God. Neither will we here speake of incestuous coniunction forbidden by the Lord, but only of two kindes of Concupiscence or Lechery, too common among Christians, & yet most pernicious and damnable. The first is adultery, whereby we vnderstand that lechery which is committed between such persons, whereof the one or both of them, are otherwise lincd by marriage, so odious a vice, that among the infidels, it was most exactly lookt into, and grievously punished. Aristotle saith, If a man or woman committeth adultery with any other then their owne wife, or husband, such a one ought to be placed in the ranke of most vilanous and infamous persons. And among the Locrians, there was a law made by one Zaleucus, that condemned adulterers to haue both their eies put out, which was afterward so well kept and obserued, that the law-makers owne sonne being found guilty therein, though all the people intreated for him, that he might be spared, Zaleucus would not hearken thereunto, but caused one of his owne eies to be put out, and one of his sonnes, that so the rigour of the law might be obserued. Augustus Caesar also made a law called Iulia, touching Adultery, which permitted the father in that case to kill his daughter. And the son of Fabius a Senator of Rome, hauing kilde his mother, and him that was taken in Adultery with her, was absolved and acquitted of the fact by the Senate of Rome.

To be short, it is certaine, that in all nations, where honour and ciuility bare neuer so little sway, his vice of Adultery hath beene grievously punished, and much hated of all generous persons. For if any man had but mooved or solicited a woman to commit adultery he was punished with diuers paines, as the ciuill lawes declare. And yet the dispensation, slackenes, and negligence of Christians in suffering such iniquity, hath begotten such libertie, that now it is a great and a rare commendation giuen and attributed to married persons, to say that they haue liued faithfully in marriage. And yet God saith, (Thou shalt not commit adultery) and hath enioyned the paines of death vpon that offence: and which is more hath giuen that iudgement against the maide, that is betrothed to a man, and to him that shal ly with her.

And these sentences are set downe in the holy Scriptures (that Adulterers shall not inherite the kingdome of God) that marriage is honorable among all men, and the bed vndefiled, but whoremongers and adulterers God will iudge. To amend this detestable vice, first let vs note, that as a man committing Adultery sinneth more grievously then the woman, because hee ought to surpass her in vertue, and to guide her by good examples, so the fault of the woman is most great, and without remedy, for thereby proceedeth confusion, and doubtfulnes of children, whereby many times, mens goods are transported and giuen to those to whom they belong not; but because, that both in the one and the other, there is breach of faith, and promise before God (as Salomon saith) they sinne equally and alike before his maiesty, and shall receiue like and most grievous punishment at the latter day. Let vs also remember, that the Lord hauing pronounced the sentence of death against Adulterers, is constant and resolute in his iudgements, and that if Magistrates doe not execute them here on earth, God hath diuers meanes to execute iudgement, and to doe iustice, both in this life, and in the life to come. As the Scriptures specially witnes, by the examples of Sedechias and Achab that were Adulterers: of Salomon that committed Idolatry by meanes of that vice: and of Dauid, by the effect of the sentence giuen by the holy Ghost, that the sword should neuer depart from his house.

The other kinde of voluptuousnes, now in question, is fornication; which is committed betweene free persons, whereof neither the one nor the other, are married, it is true, that although the Philosophers wrot many notable precepts against this vice, yet the Pagans neuer made any great account thereof, nor sought much to punish it. But they are neither lawmakers nor iudges for vs. But the most holy and euer liuing God, who, forbidding Adultery, therewith also prohibiteth carnall copulation betweene vnmarried persons (as it is written) There shal be no whore of the daughters of Israel, nor a Sodomite of the sonnes of Israel. Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore into the house of the Lord thy God. The history of the children of Iacob, (which vnder pretence of circumcision massacred all the people of Sichem, because they had defiled their sister Dina.) sheweth how much God hath alwaies beene pleased with chastity, and detested fornication, when he suffered so horrible vengeance to be taken vpon Sichem, his father, and al his subiects, because one of them had deflowred a maide.

And that specially which is written in the Scripture, that for Fornication God caused three and twenty thousand Iewes to be slaine in one daie, which is a most certaine testimony, how he alwaies condemned, and grievously punished this sinne: Therefore it ought to bee abhorred among vs that are Christians, and so much the more apprehended, in regard of the Lords iudgement to come, wee hauing receiued greater measures of the graces of God, and a more cleare, more ample, and liuelier instruction of his will, for the preservation of our bodies and soules in purity and chastitie, then the Iewes had. For so wee ought to practise and put in vre the sentence of Saint Paul, saying, That euery one of you should know how to possesse his vessell, in holinesse and honour, and not in the lust of concupiscence, euen as the Gentiles that knew not God. For this is the will of God, that wee should abstaine from fornication: and for that cause hee exhorteth all the faithfull to mortifie their members, which are on the earth, as fornication, inordinate affections, and euill concupiscence. And in another place, hee requireth, That fornication and all uncleannesse, should not bee once named among vs, as it becommeth Saints. And that wee should not company together, If any that is called a brother be a fornicator, or infected with other vices forbidden by God, and that wee should not eate with such a one. Wee haue already noted the sentences and iudgements set downe in the holy Scriptures, against dissolute and impudent persons: which iudgement to come belacuing, and the Abominable, and Murderers, and Whooremongers, and Sorcerers, and Idolaters, and all Liers, shall haue their part in the Lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.

To conclude, let vs remember, and meditate vpon the liuely and pregnant reasons aforesaid, shewed to this purpose; and vpon this also which the Apostle propoundeth vnto vs, to make vs abhorre fornication, saying, Know ye not that your bodies are the members of 1 Cor. 6. 15, Christ, shall wee then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an Harlot? God 16, 17, 18, forbid. Doe ye not know, that hee which coupleth himselfe with an Harlot is one body? For two, 19, 20.
saith hee, shall bee one flesh, but he that is ioyned vnto the Lord is one Spirit. Flee Fornication, eue-ry sinne that a man doth, is without the body, but hee that committeth Fornication, sinneth against his owne body; Know ye not that your body is the Temple of the holy Ghost, which is in you, whom you haue of God? And yet are not your owne, for you are bought for a price; therefore glorifie God in your body and in your spirit, for they are Gods. And to the same ende, let vs thinke one that which an Ancient Father hath written, saying: That when Fornication hath once sealed on mans vnderstanding, it hardly suffereth him to thinke vpon any good thing; that the naturall desires are glued, that from the suggestions of the flesh proceedeth thought, from thought affection, from affection delight, from delight consent, from consent action, from action custome, from custome despaire, or doubt of amendment, from despaire excuse, from excuse glorifying in sinne, and from glorifying in sinne, the inevitable condemnation and iudgement of God. And lastly, that if by the infirmity of our flesh, we feele our selues to be carried away to the first degrees of so damnable corruption, let vs breake, or at the least, in so good time prevent the other degrees which mount higher, that wee may auoide running headlong, and falling into eternall death.

Gregor. in

7. Of unlawfull pastimes, Dauncing, Dice, Playes and Commedies.

Wee must also note, that among our most pernicious corruptions, are reckoned foolish pastimes, and laciuous and hurtfull recreations, which many with great desire seeke after; specially, Dauncing, Dicing, Playes and Commedies. For the first, wee must (to our great shame and confusion) acknowledge that it is a common thing to see married men and women, yong men and maides, in companies together dauncing with great light-nesse, vanitie, signes, and iestures, saouring of laciuousnesse; either with instruments of musicke, or singing dissolute songs. And yet those daunces were alwaies the effects, subiects or dependances of great vices, namely of Idolatrie, drunkennesse, and fornication.
Resembling the Pagans in their most vilanous and dishonest banquets; as their feasts of Bacchus, Pan, and other such like Idols were celebrated with daunces.

And it is written of the Iewes, that when they had offered to the golden calfe, they sat downe to eate and drinke and rose vp to play, to dance after flutes, and to sing. And all great banquets and drunken feasts are commonly celebrated with the same vanities, as the Proverb saith, when the belly is full, the legges are light to dance. For we doe not often see that exercise vsed in the morning, or when men are fasting. And it is said of the Amalekites that when they sacked Siceleg, David found them dauncing, after they had eaten and drunke. For this cause an ancient father writing against dauncing in his time, said, that wine is the cause thereof. But be it what may be, we must of force confesse, that all dauncers are moued and prouoked to that action, by the pleasures of the flesh, from whence also folle concupiscences, condemned by God doe proceede, which would easily be transformed into fornication. If God by his mercy and diuine power did not preserve many from it. Wee know that Christ saith, who soeuer looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. For the eyes are like windowes, whereby the poison of concupiscence entrencheth into the heart. And so it appeareth into what danger men and women run, when by dancing they haue liberty to see each other to meet together, to feast; to embrace, to touch, and to kisse. Which are allurements and inticements to kindle the fire of Concupiscence of the flesh, or to speake more properly, right solicitors of lechery, and an invention of the Diuell: to throw men headlong into that which they ought specially to abhorre. Which made an ancient father aptly compare man and woman to two earthen vessels, which Sathan causeth to meete together, in the tempests, leapings and gambadoes of dancing, to bruse and breake each other. And Ecclesiastes after hee had said, that many Eccl. 9 10, 11.

wondring at the beauty of a strange woman, haue been cast out, for her words burne as fire, addeth, Sit not all with an other mans wife, neither lie with her vpon the bed, nor banquet with her, lest thine heart encline vnto her, and so through thy desire fall into destruction. Wherby we may conceiue, into what danger they runne, who hauing eaten & drunk with women in some banquet, where commonly they dresse themselves brauely to the shew, chuse and take them by the hand, leade them to daunce, approach neere vnto them, kisse them, and shew them their agilitie in turnings and windings about, frisking, and steppes backward and forward: They doing the like. Which actions are like great winds that kinde and set on fire their hearts; which are alreadie but too much naturally inflamed with concupiscence. And if there bee any impudent devices in dauncing, lasciuious songs, or sound of Instruments, which put them in minde of such things: Is it not as much as if one should cast oyle into the fire of concupiscence, which naturally burneth in our breasts, and to augment the danger of our vtter decay? As Saint Paul saith, that Euill words corrupt good manners. And Saint Peter saith, It is sufficient for vs that wee haue spent the time past of our liues, after the lusts of the Gentiles, walking in wantonnesse, lusts, drunkennesse, in gluttony, drinkings, and in abominable Idolatries. What can wee otherwise vnderstand by these insolencies but that which is contrarie to modestie, and Christian chastitie; and consequently all those lasciuious toies, fooleries and vanities, which are seene and found to be in dauncing? Let vs consider this exercise in it selfe, and looke vpon the leappings, skippings, turnings, and returnings, goings backward, and forward, caperings, windings about and beating or stamping of the ground with their feete, with diuers other such light toies, and it may bee truly said, that all such fooleries and vndecent actions, make them that doe them resemble men troubled in minde, or madde, rather then such as are wise, or of staied iudgement. And againe, if standing in a high place, or on a hill, wee should see a company of people dauncing and leaping, and heare no musicke play, nor any man sing, we could iudge no lesse, but that they were fooles, madde men, or drunkards.

Masking and Mummung.

This dauncing also brought the vse of Masking and Mummung in request: the shamefulnesse and scandall whereof, is so notoriously knowne, that it needes no great discourse, and therefore wee will onely say, that the face being giuen by God to man, to shew it openly, and the mouth to speake, wee doe as much as in vs lieth, to crosse the diuine ordinance of God, and wholly to contrarie him, when we put one a counterfet face, and speake not. They also are no otherwise to bee esteemed of that put on strange apparell to make themselves seeme of another sex and kinde, then by nature they were created. For it is nothing to the purpose for any man to alledge, that many of those that doe such things, thinke no euill, because that which is euill of it selfe, is vnexcusable, and all actions or things done and deuised to bee done by the motions and affections of the flesh, are not allowable.

Christ. Hom. 49. in Matth.

All the auncient fathers and doctors of the Church do agree in one, and write against dauncing; Saint Chrysostome hath written whole volumes thereof, and in one of them, wherein he speaketh of the banquet made by Herod, among other things, he saith, It was the Diuell that made him take such delight in the kings daughter, for whom he so much lusted: for where there is dauncing and leaping, there the Diuell rules. Because God gaue vs not legges to fetch gambadoes, and to shew tumbling trickes, but to walke and goe modestly or to be quiet in the company of Saints. But when the body turnes, winds, and becomes deformed by leaping impudently, it is to be thought and beleued, that the soule becommeth worse, and more villanous. And in his exposition of the marriages of Isaac and Jacob, he exhorteth Christians to marke and obserue, that there they had no dauncing: behold (saith he) how ciuilly they celebrated their marriages: vnderstand this you that make so great account of Sathanicall pompes, and contaminated filthines at the entry into the holy estate of matrimony: Was there any viols? was there any drummes? was there any diabolicall daunces there? Saint Ambrose saith, That no man daunceth vnlesse he be drunke or mad. And touching Herodias that had taught her daughter to dance, he saith, what say you holy women to this? you see what you ought to teach your daughters, and what you should make them leaue and forget: by this maide that danced, beeing the daughter of an incestuous harlot. But let her that is a chaste matron or mother, & a godly wife, teach her daughters godlines and not dauncing. It belongs to impudent women (saith an other Father) which haue cast all feare of God behinde their backs, and which make no account of the terrors and threatnings of eternall fire in hell, to prouoke their yong daughters to intemperance by teaching teaching them to dance. Then let vs boldly say, (agreeing with the iudgement of this reuerent antiquity:) That it is an inuention of the Diuell, (what faire shew or colour soeuer is set thereon:) that at this day there should be schooles erected, permitted and openly kept among vs, to teach this vanity and pernicious folly of Dancing. It were rather to bee desired that all he and she dauncers should carefully study, in the schoole of the holy Ghost, which is the doctrine of the Scriptures, to diswade themselves from dancing, that such inticements and occasions to draw, and to be drawne vnto concupiscence and wantonnes might bee abolished from among Christians. Wherein we should follow the authority of diuers counsels helde by the Church which expressely condemned dancing. As also at the last Parliament holden in Orleans, the state of France by their deputies required, that it should bee publickly forbidden, and an act was made to that purpose.

Of playing at dice, &c.
1. Cor. 10. 31.
Eph. 5. 16.
Math. 12. 36.

Touching plaies, we must resolue, that there is none of them lawfull, if they do not procure some honest benefit and commodity to man, tending to the glory of God. For that is the meaning of Saint Pauls doctrine, when he aduertiseth vs, to doe all things to the glory of God, and when he saith, Redeeming the season, for the dayes are euill. As also of Iesus Christs words, saying, That of euery euil word that men shall speake, they shall giue an account thereof at the day of iudgment. For all these instructions of the holy Ghost are set down for the ground of our proposition. We may well say, that there are plaies which consist in the exercise of the body, as to shoote in a bow, or in a barquebus, to play at fence, to wrastle, and such like; the rest in the dexterity of the spirit, as to play at chesse and draughts, all which playes are indifferent things, lawfull & permitted to Christians, when they vse them moderately, that is in regard of the first, to make themselves active and strong, that they may be the fitter, apter, and better able to serue their prince and countrey, when neede shall require: or else for the health of men in particular, as also to recreate themselves, when they are weary with working in their ordinary vocation, that hauing done, they may go to it again, with a liuelier spirit, and somewhat refreshed. Whereunto the second kind of playes may serue. But here we must aduise you of two things; First that there be no excessse vsed in these plaies, whereby men shall be seduced to leaue and neglect their ordinary vocations. Secondly, that wee must not therein vse to play for money, for failing in the first point, we should lose and abuse time, in stead of redeeming it. And for the second, it is certaine, that plaies are not in any sort approoued by diuine or humane lawes, therein to employ, or thereby to get mony, which to the contrary, God puts into our hands, to bee faithfull stewards therof, and to vse it with a good conscience. It is true, that it is otherwise to bee vnderstood, when the Magistrate propounds certaine prizes in games, made for corporall exercises to draw his subiects the willinge to come to them, and thereby to make them abler for the publike seruice of their country.

Againe, there are other playes, which depend vpon casting of lots, and hazard at dice, and cards, from the which Christians ought wholly to abstaine. For first, it may well bee said, that they are forbidden by this diuine precept, Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine: because the right vse of lots, is to referre them to the wisdom, providence, and power of God, wherewith hee worketh among men. So the Apostles vsed it in the Election of Mathias. And Salomon noteth, saying, The Lot is cast into the lappe, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord. Wherefore wee may vse Lots in things of great consequence, where the will of God, ought to bee knowne extraordinarily. But to apply them, (and consequently Gods providence therewith) to our vaine and friuolous pleasures, and oftentimes accompanied with offences against the Diuine maiestie, wee may say, that lots in that manner are abused, and so the name of God is taken in vaine.

Prou. 16. 33.

Secondly, such plaies as are permitted ought (as it is said before) to bring necessarie commoditie to the body, or to the Spirit: otherwise they are idle workes, and so there is time lost, for the which wee must yeeld account. The plaies at Cards and Dice containe no kinde of exercise, neither yet bring any profit to the health of the body, nor true recreation to the Spirit. For touching the body, by sitting long, it is made heavier, and ladeth it selfe the more with grosse humours, which by vsing any stirring exercise, or by travell, are moderated and consume: and touching the Spirit, the doubtfull chance of the Dice, or euent of the game, expected by those that play, and the feare they haue of their mo ney, either to be lost or wonne, holdeth them still in paine and anguish. If there bee an y shadow or shew of pleasure, or contentment in them, the onely ground thereof is couetousnesse, and a desire to winne money, which while they are in play, they feare to lose, and so

haue no true delight. And they neuer receiue so much pleasure in winning, that can any waies counteruaile the displeasure that they haue when they lose their money. So you see how the spirit cannot bee properly recreated, by casting of lots, nor yet the body receiue any commodity or profit thereby.

Math. 22. 39. Thirdly, that which vtterly condemneth plaies at Cards and Dice, is that the true ende and purpose of play is to draw vnto themselves other mens goods, because in them there is ready mony stakt downe. For from thence proceedeth an infinite number of most pernicious euils. That is, the losse of their goods, when the Dice crosse one of the players, and manifest theft in the other, which thinketh by vniust gaine to keepe that which belongeth to his neighbour. Which is farre from the duty and effects of Christian charity, and specially from the obedience of Gods commaundement, to loue his neighbour as himselfe. And from such iniquity proceedeth quarrels, contentions, debates, and oftentimes murders, swearing, curling, blaspheming, and to conclude, manifest impiety. Then who will not giue iudgement, that the tree which bringeth forth such fruits is most wicked and worthy to be pulled vp by the rootes? Therefore these kind of playes haue alwaies beene detested and prohibited in al wel governed estates, both Christian and Pagan. Yet it is sayd, that the Lidians being in great necessity and want of victuals, inuented this exercise, that by playing they might finde some meanes to releue themselves in that time of famine, for that many men sat playing two daies together without eating, which kinde of life continued among them for the space of 28. yeares together, and preserued their country from a great famine, by sparing victuals in that manner.

But to the contrary, at this day we see, that we are so farre from recompencing (by fasting) the fault that is committed, by so villanous an exercise, as carding and dicing is, that it is rather vsed with all kinde of dissolutenes, gluttony, excelsse, and superfluitie. Which by experience is too much seen, in those new faculties of gamsters, and people that liue wholly without any care: vnlesse it be of their bellies. It is certaine that the ancient wisemen of the world, did alwaies abhorre the manner of passing, or rather loosing of time, which ought to be vnto vs the dearest thing in the world. As among other examples, this one of a Pagan is specially to be noted, who being sent from Lacedemonia to Corinthus, to intreate of peace betweene those people, and finding the gouernors playing at dice, he turned backe againe, and would not deliuer his message, saying, that he would not defile nor stayne the Lacedemonians glory with so great an ignomie, as, to make peace and amity with dice players. We haue a law in the Digestes, which speaketh of punishing those, that induce others to play. And at Rome, they that vsed this exercise were condemned to pay a fourth part more then that which they had lost at play, for a fine. The Christian Emperors strictly forbad these kinde of playes. And the Emperor Iustinian, among other things ordained, that no man should be constrained to pay that which he had lost in play, and that if he did pay it, it was lawfull for him to aske it againe, commanding that it should be restored to the party, excepting a prescription of 50. yeares. In the Cannon Law, those plaies are prohibited vpon paine of deprivation of the communion, as the Apostolical canons (so called) declare. And S. Cyprian purposely wrot a treatise to shew how Christians ought to abhor such kind of playes, wherein among other things, he saith. That such plays are snares & inuentions of the Diuell, which he forgeth to keepe idolatry in greater vse, and recommendation among men. Noting vpon that point, that Mercury one of the Pagan Gods who is said to haue bin the inuenter of the playes at cards, caused his picture to be painted vpon them, ordaining that when men began to play, they should kisse the cards for a sacrifice vnto him, or else shed some wine vpon the table to honor his picture. Which corruptio Christiāns hauing receiued from Idolaters, haue only changed the images, putting the pictures of a king, a queen, & a knaue, (as we tearme it) on them, in stead of the Pagans idol. Therefore wee may well say, that to play at cards and dice, is to take pleasure in the works of the Diuell, and in some manner to refresh and confirme ancient Idolatry, in stead of vtterly abolishing the memory thereof. To conclude with Cyprian, let vs be children of God, and not players at cards and dice, let vs throw downe our money vpon the Table of the Lord, where Christ preseedeth and angels behold vs, that it may be giuen to the poore, and not lost foolishly. Let vs in that manner giue our goods to Christ to keepe, who will restore it vs a hundred fold againe, in perpetuall fruit. Playing at cards and dice is dangerous, worthy of death, and full of folly. There is no truth in them, but a quagmier of al sorts of lies, and false oathes: let vs withdraw our hands. Turne backe our hearts, and take away the mist of darkenes which Sathan cast before our hands, turne backe our hearts, and take away the mist of darkenesse which Sathan casts before our eies, that our hands may be cleane, and not defiled by honouring the diuell, taking pleasure in his inuentions, Let vs flie from such an enemy, that perswadeth vs by such crafty deuises; and employ our time to learne the true wisdom of the Euangelicall doctrine that wee may resist and beate backe the hurtfull darts of our malicious enemy. Let vs lift vp pure hands to Christ, and that we may please God, let vs neuer looke on Cardes nor Dice any more. So bee it. In this manner Saint Cyprian endeth his Treatise.

Touching Comedies and Tragedies. It is certaine that in that manner of recreation, which within these few yeares is become so common among Christians, there is nothing else but lewdnesse and corruption. To proue it, all the places of the holy Scriptures beforealleged, against playing at Cards and Dice, wherein wee are aduertised to doe all things to the glory of God; to redeeme the time, and to beware of euill words, and vnprofitable workes, doe specially serue. For no man is ignorant (if his iudgement bee not peruered) that in such shewes acted by Stages players, God is dishonoured and offended many waies, time ill employed, and good manners depraued. Let vs heare certaine Auncient Fathers speaking to this purpose, who not content to reprove these foolish representations, because long since they were instituted by Pagans, in honour of their false gods; (for in regard thereof only, wee must confesse that they are detestable, and not to be vsed among Christians (but also for diuers sinnes therein committed against God, and for the vices which proceede thereof, to the great detriment and hurt of many. S. Cyprian saith, Although such spectacles had neuer bene consecrated to false Gods, yet Christians ought not to see them, nor to bee present at them, for if it were not so great a sinne as it is, in them there is an infinite number of vanities, and many things altogether vnfit for, and ill becomming Christian grauitie. For if man of himselfe be inclined to all vice, what will he doe when he hath examples to intice and prouoke him more thereunto? And if our nature of it selfe, be subiect to imbecility and weakenes, what will it be when by indirect courses it shal be led headlong into vice? And in another place, he saith, Vpon Theaters and Stages, you see things acted whereof you should be ashamed, and much moued in minde thereat. There you haue a lively representation of murders, incests, and other execrable actions, to put you in minde of the wickednesse in former times committed. All that are present to heare and see them learne thereby, that the same which in former ages hath bin done, may be done againe. Sinne is not defaced by length or space of time, no age suffocateth wickednesse, neither doth obliuion bury Iniquitie. But that which for a while was left of, being in these daies renewed, serueth for an euill example.

Lactantius saith, What doe the gestures or countenances of players teach vs, but villany and filthines? what will yong men doe, when they see such abominable things represented vpon stages, without all shame or impeachment, & that euery one beholdeth them so gladly, and with so great applause? It is not to bee doubted, but that the things which they see there, put them in a conceit to doe and practise the like: and that they are prouoked and stirred vp vnto diuers filthy motions, by the pleasures which they take in that which they behold, and returne home with their hearts full of bad desires, and their soules corrupted with the venom thereof. S. Iohn Chrysostome saith, At playes adultery is conceived, and dishonest loue taught: calling them the schoole of intemperance, the band of all dissolution, a place to minitter laughter, and the example of dishonesty. If concupiscence (saith hee in another place) and euill desire assaile vs in the Church, while we are singing Psalmes, while the word of God is preaching, and when we are most attentiuetherin to pray, how is it possible when wee are at a play, where wee neither heare nor see any thing that is good, and where wee are inuironed with many perils and dangers, for vs to escape and shun the power of so many subtil and craftie enemies, as are there assembled together? And if when man by chaunce meeteth with a woman, apparelled as she ordinarily goeth, oftentimes hath his heart so much inflamed by beholding her, that the sight of her only sufficeth to intrap him, & to moue him to lust after her: what shal we say of them which spend whole daies in theaters, at their leasures to see & behold beautifull women brauely tired and apparelled, heare nothing but lasciuious speeches, Sirens songs, inticing vowes, & looke on painted faces, alluring eyes, and bodies set forth in such maner, that there are thousand snares to intrap and deceiue those that behold them? We must not (saith S. Basil) imploy our sight to behold the vanities of stage plaiers, nor vse our eares to heare musick and songs, which seduce and corrupt our hearts: for such kind of delights draw after them perpetual ignominy & seruitude.

Eccles. 9. 3, 4.

Saint Augustine calleth Theaters, Storehouses of incontinency, and a publike profession of wickednesse, saying, That among the occasions of sinne, which they most shunned, who in times past earnestly repented, one was, Not to be present at such spectacles. Saint Salvian saith, That sinne onely and ordinarily infecteth those senses and powers of the body, whereby they are seene and receiued, as filthy thoughts corrupt the soules, vnchaste sight the eyes, and filthy speeches and words the eares. And that although men offend God by one of these parts, the rest are still cleane and without sinne. But when wee are present at Comedies, there is no part in man exempted from sinne: for there the soule is inflamed with euill desires, the eyes are poisoned with that which they see, the eares with that which they heare, and whatsoever is done therein, is so filthy and pernicious, that it cannot be spoken of without blushing. To be short all the ancient Fathers, condemned such plaies and spectacles, placing them among the workes of Satan; and for a certaine cause and occasion of the corruption of manners, and the ruine of Common wealthes. And therefore diuers politike, and well gouerned common wealthes, (although they had not receiued the light of Christian faith) would not permit Plaies in their Townes. Others knowing what hurt and dammage they brought into their Cities, banished them from thence, and some would neuer suffer their wives and daughters to goe to such sports, esteeming them that did so, to be so infamous, that they deprived them of their freedome, specially at Rome. Saint Augustine saith, yet it is true, that as vertue in man is finite and limited, so it cannot alwaies be employed in graue and important affaires, but hath neede of some respite and intermission in labours, and some honest recreation, as wee haue already said touching all men in generall; In such sort that for a man to know how to recreate himselfe, and to intertaine others therein, with requisite meanes and measure. It is an action of vertue: which the Auncient Fathers tearmed Ioyfulness. But wee must know, that it is sinne in such recreations to vse lasciuious words, or dishonest gestures to suffer our selues by excesse to bee carried away to the vaine pleasures of any pastime whatsoever, or to say or doe any thing, which is not commendable, and conuenient for the time, place and persons which recreate themselves. And after that manner, it may happen, that things which are acted in some Comedies, may bee honest and holy, and those that Acte them, should bee notable persons well aduised, to behaue themselves in such sort, that thereby no hurt nor scandale should arise or bee given. Yet wee cannot alwaies excuse, the badde actions which are oftentimes mixed with those good Acts: for whatsoever may bee alledged to the contrary they are preiudiciall to vertue, and wholly unfit for Christian grauitie: specially, such plaies as ordinarily haue those plaies in them.

To conclude, if euill wordes corrupt good manners, (as the Apostle saith:) And if the holy Ghost forbiddeth vs to cast our eyes vpon a wicked woman, If wee will not fall into her snares, and not to vse the company of a woman that is a Singer, and a Dauncer, nor to heare her, lest wee bee taken by her craftinesse. And if our Sauour hath taught vs, that hee which looketh vpon a woman to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart: what hurt will not villanous and filthy actions doe, which are shewed openly vpon stages in Tragedies and Comedies, and whereby all the senses are tempted and corrupted? Who is so vaine glorious, and presumptuous, to thinke or imagine, that hee can bee assured in so euident a danger, and feele no euill motions among thole infernall practises, nor commit any sinne, finding himselfe to bee in the company of so many faire, lasciuious, and wanton women, not onely of those that ordinarily play vpon the stage, but of others that willingly frequent them? It is an easie matter for them, by their indecent motions and gestures, their vnchaste eyes, their dissolute apparell, and their sweete voyces, like Syrens to inchant and transforme those that delight to heare and to behold them into beastes, giuing them so much the greater occasion to ouerthrow themselves, as they are shamelesse, wicked, and incontinent.

8. Of Enuie and Slaunder.

There resteth yet two other most pernicious vices, to make the number of seauen compleate, wherein wee haue comprehended our greatest corruptions. That is Enuie, and Slaunder: which also proceede from the forger of humane miseries, the enemy enemy of our saluation, and are branches of Sathanicall malice, as it is written, That by the enuy of the Diuelli, death entered into the world. For this wicked and malicious enemy of mankind, being so enuious that hee could not endure to see the glory whereunto God had called man, was moued thereby to tempt our first parents: whose ambition and disobedience gaue place to sinne. And the first branch of this wicked plant being Enuy, was the cause that moued Adams eldest sonne to kill his yonger brother Abel.

 And to speake truth, this vice of Enuy, is a passion of the soule, breeding bitterness, malice, and griefe therein, against the commendable and worthy qualities that are in others.
 From whence in an enuious mans heart, there riseth a secret hatred to those, whom he seeth to prosper, whether they be his superiours, inferiours, or equals: being grieved that he is not comparable with the first, and fearing that the others would prosper and become his equals, or els surpass him: resembling one that hath a tender sight, to whom the light or any bright shining things is hurtfull. Therefore, whereas all other vices bring some pleasure with them (although triuolous and accursed) enuy onely to the contrarie, is alwaies accompanied with sadnesse and griefe, because mans heart is setled therein, and receiueth and feelth it in his body, as if it bit and gnawed his stomacke. VVhereby it may well be approved, that they did not much erre, which said, That enuy is most iust, because shee procureth that paine and punishment to the enuious man, which he deserueth. Saint An- gustine saith, shee resembleth a shippe, tossed in the waues of the sea, alwaies troubled, raging without cause, helde in miserie full of furie, and like to a rauening Wolfe. It is the scurfe of the soule (saith Saint Cyprian) the turbation of the thoughts, and the rust of the heart. For as rust eateth Iron (saith Saint Basil) so Enuy eateth him in whole heart it lodgeth. VVhich Salomon very well noteth, saying: That Enuy is the rotting or corrupting of the heart. And as the Viper knaweth a hole in the mothers belly to come forth: so en-uy consumeth his heart that hath conceiued it, to bring forth that which is hurtfull to another man. For desiring and wishing no good to any man, shee vseth a generall iniustice, wholly abandoning the office and dutie of humanitie, to hurt those whom shee ought rather to loue and cheerish. So it appeareth, that there is no vice more detestable, nor more contrarie to charitie, then enuy. And therefore Saint Paul saith. Loue is not enui- ous, it reioyceth not in iniquitie, it thinketh no euill. And Saint James giueth it the name of bitter: vnderstanding thereby, that it is a venim or poison of ill will, conuerting all things into bitterness: from whence ensueth contentions and debates. As the Apostle addeth, that where enuy and strife is, there is sedition and all manner of euill workes.
 As in truth, hatred (which Saint Iohn placeth in the ranke of murders) willingly followeth enuy, and so powerfully in some men, that it makes them commit homicides, and other crimes.

We haue already shewed how by this second passion of euils, man from the beginning was induced to harbor murder in his heart, to moisten the earth with brothers blood. A- *dam*s sinne then beginning to take his first effect in his sonne Cain vpon innocent Abel, for a testimony in time to come, that wicked men should haue prerogative in this world, to oppresse the good. Saul, by enuy oftentimes sought to kill Dauid: And the children of Jacob consulted together to put their brother Ioseph to death, and afterwards solde him for money to Marchants that caried him into Egypt, from among the children of God, by that meanes exposing his body to misery, and his soule to vtter perdition. Whereby we learne, and may well say, that there is no vice more odious, nor more to bee shunned, then enueie, which hauing diminished no part of the malignitie of her originall, thrusteth men forward into wicked and execrable actions.

And yet, to what passion can wee say that wee are more inclined, or willinger to giue place, then to this most pernicious vice? Let every man enter into the cabinet of his owne Conscience, and he shall therein finde a thousand sprigs of enuy and ielousie, ingrafted in the best part of his soule. For as the foolish loue of our selues, is a plague wherewith all the children of Adam are infected: So is enueie, which proceedeth thereof. From whence this Prouerbe riseth, That one Potter alwayes enuyeth another, either in respect of commoditie, or of honour. An other Prouerbe saith, That our neighbours eye is alwayes an enemy, or enuious vnto vs. And to verifie it, wee see very fewe that can endure, without some dislike, that those that are of their qualitie or trade, should be more esteemed, and rise to be greater then they, much lesse can wee without enuy endure, that those whom wee esteeme to bee of lesse estimation then our selues, should attaine to degrees of honour and reputation aboue vs : And to bee brieft, This vice in one sort or other, infuseth her venom into our breasts. And yet it should suffice vs, that our owne wickednesse which is great and abundant, doth afflict vs without troubling our mindes, at the prosperitie of others, and by that meanes make our selues two fold miserable. But malignant enuy, enemie to the quietnesse of him that entertaineth her, will by no meanes permit it. Wherefore, seeing this vice begetteth and nourisheth so many others, to reuenge her owne iniquitie in her selfe, and that there is nothing more contrary to Christian Charitie, nor that sooner thrusteth men forward to commit most detestable crimes, when by degrees this cursed passion possesseth their hearts : let vs abandon and vtterly forsake all the branches of enuie ; which (as all other damnable affections) is borne and conceived with the corruption of our nature : And let every man content himselfe with the estate and condition whereunto God hath called him, faithfully imploying his time therein, and attending the blessing of the Lord, let him neuer be iealous for the good gifts and graces which it pleaseth him by his most iust liberality to bestow vpon others. For whosoever doth to the contrarie, opposeth himselfe (as much as in him lyeth) against the providence and soueraigne libertie of G O D. Who according to his diuine wisdom and power, most wisely ordereth all things, by number, waight and measure. It is true, that if in vs there remaines any sparkes or seedes of the true affections of nature, as it was first created in our hearts, wee might serue ourselues with prouocations of enuy, to pricke vs forward, and to moue our mindes, to get and obtaine those true benefits whereunto Saint Paul doth exhort vs, speaking of diuers gifts of the spirit of God in his Church, That wee might be desirous of the best gifts, without discontentment, rather reioycing, and giuing glory and thanks to Christ, for those wherewith hee enricheth our brethren.

Psal. 119.

Slauder.

Let vs imitate the good (saith Saint Cyprian) if we be able to second them in vertue, if not, let vs reioice to see them grow vp in godlinesse, let vs bee partners with them in loue, instead of enuying at them : Let vs make our selues coheires with them of vertues by coniunction for Charity, and brotherly vuity. As Saint Paul making mention of collections for the poore, saith, Achaia was prepared a yeare agoe, and your zeale hath prouoked many. As if he would say, that the emulation and holy enuy, which others had conceived by the example of the Corinthians, had pricked them forward to enlarge their charity towards the poore. To conclude, let vs remember that there belongeth a good and conuenient enuie to Christians, which respecteth and hath a regard to good and vertuous men, to follow their steps, and to the iust, to become iust with them, as Saint Augustine saith.

Touching the vice of Slander, Backbiting, and Reuiling, (for these three words signifie all one thing, when a man speaketh against his neighbour, to the preiudice of his honor, reputation and credit) they are expressely prohibited in this diuine precept, Thou shalt not beare false witnesse against thy neighbour. For the branches of this commandement extend themselves very farre. As first, They that before a magistrate or otherwise by oath, or words simply auerre and affirme a falshood, to the preiudice of an other man, are herein condemned, and are properly called callumniators, and consequently children of the Deuill, the first inuentor of this iniquity, as his name also signifieth : for that false Serpent to deceiue Eua, durst take vpon him to belie God, as if hee through enuy had forbidden Adam to eate the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and euill : by which meanes causing man to fall, he deuised by sinne to infect Adam and all his posteritie with the same venom and poison of calumination.

Secondly, although that which is reported or alledged against any man, be true in it selfe, yet if it be related and recited otherwise, & in another sence then it was said or done, that also is false witnes. Likewise wee fall into the same vice and error, when wee tell that which is true, thereby to gather matter of slander, and to perswade men to beleue some other wicked and reprochfull thing. Wee know that God in the Iudaicall Lawe, ordained, That a false witnesse should be punished with the like paine that the crime or offence wherewith he charged his neighbour wrongfully deserved. And to that purpose Solo non saith, That a false witnesse shall not bee unpunished : and hee that speaketh lies, shall not escape. Wee reade in the Psalmes of David, how many horrible curses hee pronounceth against those that had slandered him. Which are so many Prophetes pronounced by the holy Ghost against callumniators. For which cause if there bee any sparkes of conscience in vs, we wil abhorre false witnessing, and withdrawe our mindes from giuing out, or spreading false reports of our neighbours : That wee may not bee esteemed children of the Diuell ; which is the father of lies. For it is the duty of a Christian, to keepe himselfe pure and vndefiled from all detractions and euill reports (how light or small soeuer we esteeme them) which consist in relation and recitall of the faults and infirmities which wee note to bee in our neighbour, although, that which wee can say and iustifie bee true. And yet there is no vice more common among men then this, because wee are wickedly inclined, rather to speake euill then any good which wee know of our neighbours : and when with this naturall imperfection, hatred, ambition, or enuy ioyneth, it is as it were oyle cast vpon the fire, which wee secretly hatch within our breasts to make it flame out; and burne brighter. For euill speaking against, or of him whom wee hate, giueth vs a kinde of inward contentment, as a manner of reuenge which wee take of him. And euery Ambitious man willingly imagineth and conceiueth his honour to bee the more encreased, by how much the more hee taketh away the honour and credite of him whom hee blameth or slandereth: for enuy hath his entent and purpose, to lessen and diminish the credit of his neighbour, by speaking euill of him, that it may be a step or footstoole to the envious, to eleuate and raise himselfe aboue an other. Therefore Moses saith, Thou shalt not goe up and downe as a tale bearer among thy people. By this word Goe, properly taxing those, that runne from place to place, curiously to enquire of their neighbours imperfections, afterward to report them abroad, and so to speak euil of them. Which imperfection is also represented by Saint Paul saying, All men are naturally infected with these vices, To haue their throats an open Sepulchre, to vse their tongues to deceit, to beare the poison of Asps under their lips, and to haue their mouths full of cursings and bitterness. For the common and ordinary speeches of those that are any thing familiar together, sufficiently shew, that their vsual manner is, to discourse of the faults and infirmities of their neighbours, because our tongues are so bitter & full of venim, instead of being mild, and inclined to charity & compassion. Which is a disease so much the more dangerous, because we cannot easily preuent it, and for that the contagion thereof, which redoundeth to another mans hurt, is most pernicious. For we may easilier take heed and beware of one that stealeth any thing from vs, then of him which detraeth from vs, and violateth our good name, which neuerthelesse, is much more to be esteemed then riches : as the slander of a malicious tongue is almost incurable, it being a difficult thing for a man so to rid and iustifie himselfe of a slander once raised against him, that there will not remaine some euill impression thereof in many persons; as it is seene by great wounds, which leaue a scarre after them when they are healed. Which Diogenes well noted, who beeing askt, What beast biteth hardest, made answer, that among Domesticall or tame beasts the Flatterer, and among Sauage beastes, the Slaunderer biteth foremost. And those that giue care to slaunders and backbiting speeches, are no lesse to bee blamed and reprooued then the slaundersers themselves, because they shew themselves to be touched with one self same imperfection, to take a delight to speake euil of an other. But (which is worse) whosoever taketh pleasure to heare the imperfections and infirmities of another, sheweth thereby, that in him there is no zeale of the glory of God, nor charity towards his neighbor. For seeing that God is dishonored by the sin of men, when any man tels vs of them, we ought to be sorrowfull to heare & vnderstand of any such offence made against the diuine maiestie of God. And Christian charitie should beget in vs compassion towards our brother, because that by his vices he draweth the wrath of God vpon himself. Therefore Dauid protesteth that he which receiueth a false report against his neighbour, shall not dwell in the holy mountaine. As S. Bernard aduertiseth vs, saying, Take heed of beeing curious or inquisitiue to looke into, or rashly to iudge of an other mans life; and although thou findest or perceiuest any thing in him that is euill, iudge him not, neither condemne him therefore : and if thou canst not excuse the fact, at the least excuse his intent, ignorance, forgetfulnesse, misadvisednesse, and other inconueniences : And if the thing bee so euident, that thou canst not excuse it, nor make any commendable conclusion thereof, to the honour and credit of him that hath committed the fact, looke into thy selfe, and say in thine heart, Certainly it was a strong and vehement temptation that incited and moued this man thereunto, I my selfe might also fall vnder such a burthen, if God did not sustaine and vphold me by his grace. By this meanes an affection of compassion and charitie towards our neighbour that hath erred, would rise in our hearts, together with an effect of wisdom, and good aduise for our own instruction, and will not suffer euill report and slander to haue any place within our thoughts.

Leu. 19. 16.

Rom. 3. 13.

Plutar. in Apoth.

Psal. 15. 3.
Sup. Cant.

And we may in regard of our selues make an other profit and benefit of this so common a vice, (if we be not foolisher then Infidels were) who taught, that the best way and meanes for man to stop the mouthes of slanderers, and the notablest reuenge that may bee taken of them, is, to bee the more earnest to practise and to studie to doe well, as wee see they are prone, and more inclined to slander vs. For as the Sunne being right ouer the head, or top of any thing whatsoever, casteth but a very short shadow, because of the light that shineth round about it: so the excellencie of vertue and desert in whomsoever it be, in the end constraineth the slanderer to hold his tongue, and in a maner cleane extinguisheth his slander, not being able any more to hurt a right honest man. Then if we heare and vnderstand that one speaketh euill of vs, let vs liue in such sort, that credit may not bee given to false reports, and let them likewise serue vs for an aduice, to beware of falling into the same vice, for the which wee are blamed: because wee are weake, and alwayes ready to erre. But let vs specially remember that the patience of a Christian is tryed by detraction and false reports, wherewith they are pursued by the wicked, as Saint Augustine saith. In this therefore wee must follow Iesus Christ, of whom Saint Peter witnesseth, That when hee was reuiled, reuiled not againe, but committed it to him that iudgeth righteously; so farre was hee from being any thing moued when men spake euill of him. To this example wee may adde that of David, to comfort vs likewise; who protesteth, That when those that had charged him with false reports were sicke, hee put on sackcloth, and humbled his soule with fasting, and doubled his prayer for them, with a sorrowfull and an afflicted heart. Yet it is not said, that an honest man should neglect his honour and good reputation; but rather that hee ought to maintaine and preferue the same, by all commendable meanes that GOD shall aford him, without breach of Charitie, and peace with his neighbour, alwayes hauing a speciall care to liue honestly, and vprightly, not onely before the Lord, but also before men, as Saint Paul saith. Otherwise wee ought to be satisfied with the testimonie of a good conscience, walking betweene honour and dishonour, euill report, and good report, being well assured, that God in the end will make our innocency appeare, and will blesse the patience, peaceableness, and contentment which we shall haue in him.

To conclude, let vs obserue these three points of the dutie of a Christian: first, to abstaine from all slander and detraction: secondly, not to hearken nor giue care to backbiters: and thirdly, not to be moued nor vexed so much for any euill reports or slanders raised against vs, as to giue euill speeches againe, or to doe euill for euill. Touching the two first points, if we doe the contrarie, wee serue the Diuell; by the one with our tongues, by the other with our eares, and giue euident testimony, that wee are vtterly bereft of loue towards God, and charitie towards our neighbours. For the third and last point, a true Christian ought so to behaue himselfe, that he should neuer doe iniurie for iniurie, knowing, that doing so, hee shall doe euill. And for conclusion of this instruction, let vs carefully ingraffe in our memories, this sentence of Saint James, saying, If any man among you seeme religious, and refraineth not his tongue, but deceiveth his owne heart, that mans Religion is vaine.

9. Conclusion of this Chapter.

Thus wee see, by the discourse of the eight severall diuisions of this Chapter, that Christian Philosophy is not a Doctrine of words, but of a holy life, purged and clenfed of seuen principall and pernicious vices, and that this science ought not to bee comprehended by the vnderstanding and memorie onely (as other humane disciplines commonly are) but should rather haue an interior possession in the soule, and be seated in the depth, and profunditie of the heart, and so become profitable and fruitfull, continually shewing forth the vertues thereof. To the which ende, let this be our speciall care and intent, so to direct and bend all the course of our actions, that by integritie of life wee may attaine to that perfection, which the Gospel teacheth vs, which according to the common phrase of the holy Scriptures is, to haue a pure simplicitie of heart cleane void of all dissimulation that we may walke holily and righteously before God, all the daies of our liues. Then let euery one of vs take this course, as neere as possibly we can, euery houre to better our liues, that wee may attaine to the prise of our saluation. And if it happen not vnto vs, as wee wish and desire, yet wee shall continually get something, if we liue better this day then we did did the day before. Alwaies hauing a constant regard to the end whereunto wee must attaine, and not to deceiue our selues with a vaine flattering, pardoning, and bearing with our owne vices; but rather let vs continually strue to become better vntill we haue attained to that foueraigne goodnesse, which we are to pursue and search after, as long as wee liue heere on earth, to obtaine the same, when being dispoiled, and hauing put off the infirmities of the flesh, we shall be fully made participants of the onely and eternall good, in the Kingdome of heauen.

That there are seven principall vocations, wherein euery man is bound to shew the fruits of Christian Philosophie: whereof marriage is the first, and to know what common duties belong to a married man and a woman, as also the particular offices of a woman towards her husband, and of a man towards his wife. Chap. 13.

1. Men are called to diuers vocations, and euery man is to follow the same uprightly.

Hitherto in the particular discourses of our Christian Philosophy, we haue propounded and set downe generail rules, whereby euery one may be led and directed vnto a right course how to order his waies here on earth, withall shewing, wherein principally we ought to amend our liues. Now we must proceede further to particular vocations, specially to those that are of most account, which being truly ordered and obserued, make all the rest proceede well, for the good and profit of mankind. For by the holy Scriptures, we do not onely learne, that the distinction of estates and degrees are ordained by the prouidence of God, Gen. 4. 2. but also that in his holy word hee enioyneth and commandeth vs to obserue and follow the same. As the two first sons of Adam, the one was a husbandman, the other a sheepeheard. And the seruants of God alwaies exhorted the faithfull carefully to looke vnto their actions, euery one in their vocations, to be content therewith. To follow the same, & not inconsiderately to enter into, or seeke for any other. As God (saith Saint Paul) hath distributed to euery 1. Cor. 7. 17. 20. man as the Lord hath called euery one, so let him walke. And againe, let euery man abide in the same vocation, wherein he was called. Therefore it belongeth vnto vs to labour in our estates and lawfull manner of liuing, as a certen abiding assigned vnto vs by the diuine maiesty of God, and as a perpetuall rule whereunto we must bend and direct the ende and purpose of al our intents. That so we may enforce our selues euen to the last day, to become the same, which finally we shal be, If we follow the wil and commaundements of God, assuring our selues that there is no work done by vs, how little or base soeuer it is held & esteemed to be, which doth not as it were shine, and is most precious before the heauenly throne: if it be done in faith, and for the seruice of God, in that estate and condition whereunto he hath called vs.

To goe on and to proceed with our discourse, wee must consider of seven principall vocations whereunto men are called heere on earth, which make euery well ordered estate and Common wealth, compleate and flourishing. That is the state of Marriage: of Fathers and Mothers, of Children, of Magistrates, of Subiects, of Pastors, or Ministers, and of the Congregation of the faithfull. Touching the first, wee know, that after God by his great power and goodnesse had created man, he presently gaue him a woman, to be his faithfull companion, and a gracious comfort vnto him during his life, and for the encreasing and continuing of humane kinde: wherein we are to consider that it is the first and commonest vocation of man, and honourable among all, That is it which wee learne of Moses and the Apostles and holy Euangelists testifie, that our Lord Iesus Christ honoured marriage not onely with his owne presence, but also with his first miracle. Then as those which intend to liue in that holy vocation consecrated by God himselfe, ought to proceed holily therein, with pleasing prayers and vowes made vnto the Lord, so being entred thereinto, they are to vse the benefit of marriage, as a diuine institution, with all purity and honour: Thereby to ease the infirmity of the flesh, (as Saint Paul saith, and not to be prouoked to the lusts thereof, by intemperance. Now for a first and principall point of this vocation, man and woman must neuer forget that which God sayd, when he created Eua. (It is not good that the man should be alone, I will make him an helpe meete for him;) for by this sentence, all married couples haue a leasson and a certaine instruction touching the end of marriage, that they ought mutually to aide and helpe, and comfort one the other, with all good, amiable and willing desire. For first God saith, that company is profitable for man, and that marriage shall bee a great comfort and succour vnto him during his life. Then he appointeth the woman a rule to gouerne her selfe orderly in her vocation, to the end to teach her and the man also their duties. For whereas in our common translation we say (to assist or helpe him) the hebrew translation saith, (before him) with a distinction importing similitude or resemblance. Whereby we learne, that woman is as it were in the presence of man, that they may haue correspondence and conformity together, and be an aide and comfort one vnto another, (as Saint Paul a good interpreter of the diuine words aforesayd) saith. Let the husband giue to the wife due beneuolence, and likewise also the wife vnto the husband: adding, the wife hath not the power of her owne body, but the husband, and likewise also the husband hath not the power of his owne body, but the wife. Then their requisite common duties consist here in, that with a good accord, and agreement, they must liue and loue together, holily, amiable, and peaceably, nor onely in begetting of children, and bringing them vp, but also in the gouernment of their houses and families, and all things concerning the seruice of God, and the saluation of their owne soules. Consequently we must note, that chastity ought to be the inseparable band or knot of their coniunction, both of them being very wary and circumspect about all things, not to make any breach of faith, in marriage by adultery, and not that onely, but they must also with great and speciall care, shunne all things, which in any wife may tend or prouoke them vnto that iniquity, or that may procure any entrance, apparance, inticement, or occasion thereunto: for by the word adultery, is not onely vnderstood the actuall deede of lechery, but also the inticements, gestures, words, and vnchaste lookes of those that are prouoked thereunto; according to the sentence of our great Master & law giuer Iesus Christ: saying, but I say vnto you, that whosoever looketh vpon a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. And withall they must also carefully preuent all matter of ialousie, which is a most dangerous disease, and hard to be cured, and yet easily fallen into, and by that meanes turne a good & happy marriage into a most miserable state and condition. For the other common duties required betweene man and wife, first in regard of their children, it consisteth in the bringing of them vp, (whereof hereafter we will speake more at large.)

Secondly, concerning the meanes how to nourish and provide for them, as also for their families; for therein belongeth a common care vnto them both, in such manner: neuer thelesse, that properly it is the husbands charge to get and gather wealth, and the womans to distribute and dispose thereof in her house. But in such sort, that as the woman according to her qualitie & habilitie ought to be an aid and assistance to her husband, in the getting of their goods, so shee must helpe him in the dispensation thereof: For he that troubleth his owne house, (saith the Wise man) shall inherit the wind. This order and policie consisteth herein, That the man must doe his owne worke, apply himselfe to his owne office, and follow his businesse according to his vocation, without any molestation therein to bee giuen him by the wife, as seeming to meddle therewith, or to controule him, vnlesse it be with great discretion and modestie: And likewise, that the husband should not but soberly and with good consideration looke into, and meddle with household affaires properly belonging to his wife. For as the husband is ialous of his authoritie and reputation, so the wife is much inclined to suspicion of being despised therein by her husband: And as the husband doth not easily nor willingly indure, that his partner should bee better aduised then himselfe, in that which belongeth to his charge: so the woman cannot abide, that her husband should despise, and esteeme her to bee vntit for the gouernment of his family, and seeke to meddle with the pettie businesse of the house.

These

These two points wel obserued by them both on either side, it will bee a great means to make their mariage peaceable, & cause them to liue commodiously together: As to the contrary an idle, slack, and slothful husband in his vocation, and a woman that is a carelesse improvident housewife, are two gulfs and large currants to vtter ruine. He that hath such a woman, throwes his labour into a sack that is full of holes: and a wise woman that hath a foole to her husband, drawes a cart without horses, heauily laden in a sandie way. But if there bee any remedy for a wise man, that falleth into such an euil, it is patience, with some moderate severity, and wise instruction, but specially earnest prayer vnto God to remedy the same: As the woman is to support, and kindly and modestly to exhort her husband, alwaies giuing him an amiable countenance, & intertainment, that so at the last by gracious meanes he may be brought to be carefull to follow his vocation, and to keepe at home. Wee must further note, that all the common duties betweene a married man and his wife, ought singularly to be grounded vpon the vnion of their marriage. For that God saith from the beginning, that they are one flesh, and Iesus Christ confirmeth the same in the Gospell. For so we must consider of the creation of Eua, made of one of mans ribs, whereby we are taught, that the wife is a part of her husband, and as it were the halfe. In such manner, that man in his wife, hath as it were a glasse to behold and contemplate himselfe; as the woman also ought to consider the like in her husband, seeing she is flesh of the flesh of man, blood of his blood, and bone of his bones, as if she were his owne body, or els an other himselfe. From this vnion should proceed their mutuall loue. For no man hateth his owne flesh, (saith Saint Paul) but nourisheth and cherisheth it, and therefore commandeth husbands to loue their wiues, and wiues to loue their husbands. Of which loue neuerthelesse, the foundation is there vnited, which maketh both of them to be one flesh, the man as the head, and the woman as his body, and so it followeth that their reciprocall loue ought to be firme and inuolable. But the mischief is, that it is not so in many marriages, but to the contrary, is grounded vpon beauty, riches, parentage, and other such like worldly and carnall considerations, which as they are subiect to change, alteration, losse, and many other discommodities: so their amity which like straw easily set on fire, waxeth weary, and vpon small occasion is soone quenched. And therefore the remembrance of two in one flesh, by the holy coniunction of marriage, ought specially to be continued betweene man and wife, that so they may obtaine and conferre betweene them that beneuolence which proceedeth thereof, and which is the mother and nourisher of peace and concord, which only maketh a happie and blessed family. For from want of this loue, strife, debate, disorders, and other such like afflictions, spring and haue their originall, which conuert and change the paradise of marriage to a very hell.

Eph. 5. 25. 29.

Tit. 2. 5.

From the dissention of the husband and his wife (saith Saint Augustine) proceedeth the trouble of the house, and consequently the ruine thereof. They must therefore loue one another, to auoide all strife and debate, and specially before all things, haue a care thereof when they are newlie married. For as a vessell made of two pieces glued together easily breaketh at the first, but in tract of time waxeth stronger: so it is with a married couple, newly ioined together by the band of matrimony. Therefore it importeth them much, in the beginning to cut of all enmitie betweene them, whose wils should be one, their affections alike, and there two hearts conioined in one, as we haue formerly said. This loue, (the mother of peace) begetteth care & indeuor graciously & friendly to support and beare one with the other in all things, and so to practise that which S. Paul requireth, at the handes of all the faithfull, to be curteous, tenderhearted, and forgiuing one the other. As God for Christes sake freely forgau vs. And so thinking thereon, the husband should remember that hee hath married a daughter of Eua, sepleat with infirmities and corruptions; and the woman likewise, that shee hath not chosen an Angel to be her husband, but a childe of Adam, full of vice and corruption. And the wisest of them both must sanctifie the other, that they may bring vpon them and their children, the blessing of God, which hath called them in peace, alwayes beseeching him to conforme them vnto his diuine will, and with patience stay the time till their partners doe the like, that they may liue happily together. Therefore when the husband is inclined to bee angry, and the wife to bee froward, one of them should be wary to abstaine and giue no occasion. A bell (saith the Prouerbe) is an instrument of a great sound; but whosoever will not heare it, must not ring it: and if the one beginneth to bee angry, the other should either counterfet the deafe, not to heare, or the dumbe not to speake. As Alphonso king of Arragon said, That mariage would be peaceable and without dissention, If the husband were deafe, and the wife blind. Which is as much to say, that the woman should beare with many infirmities in her husband, as if shee saw them not, and a man should dissemble and wincke at his wifes angry speeches, as if he hard them not. And to be short, If on the one side, the woman ought to be subiect and obedient to her husband, as to her head, and therefore endure much at his hands, the husband for his part also ought to haue compassion on his wife, and to gouerne her with more lenity and curtesie, as being frailer, and by her naturall complexion weaker and subiecter to passion: And both of them must not so much respect that which they endure, each at the others hands, as that which they endure for their owne profit, for by that meanes they shall easily auoide all strife and contention. We must also note, that from this good agreement grounded vpon the vnion of two in one flesh, proceedeth a second common duty, neuer to seeke, nor once so much as to thinke vpon separation, according to the sentence pronounced by the Lord, saying. Let no man put asunder that which God hath coupled together, for as the coniunction is made by God, (saith Saint Augustin) so diuorcement proceedeth from the Diuel. For there is nothing but adultery only, that can separate them, in all other things they are bound to support and beare one with the other, that they may liue in peace. But specially aboue all other things, both the husband and the wife, must pray vnto God, to giue them grace to obtaine peace and reciprocall amity, and that they may be helpfull one vnto the other, for their saluations.

These are two singular common duties, belonging both to the husband and to the wife, of the first whereof, who soeuer shall desire to taste the sweetnes of the fruits, which it produceth, ought to be most carefull daily while he liueth, to craue the same at the hands of the God of peace and concord. Otherwise, those that liue, contentiously, and carelesly, examining their owne consciences, may finde occasion to impute the reason of their miserable estate, to their owne negligence, of not imploying themselves in that duty of praying vnto God, to obtaine a peaceable life. For the second point, to helpe on the other touching their saluation. It consisteth in the practising of that which S. Paul teacheth vs. Let those that haue wives be as though they had none, which is as much to say, that they should in such manner enioy the benefit of marriage, that there may not happen any diuorce between the & God, that they bee not hindred nor withdrawne from doing any duty towards God, nor towards their neighbours, nor that any trouble or vexation proceeding from household affaires, should make them carelesse, or giue them any motion to thinke or conceiue any thing in their mindes, contrary to their vnion and profession of the children of God, but to persist and continue together to glorifie him, and to encourage eache the other, to doe good workes.

1. Cor. 7. 29.

3. Particular duties of the wife.

Touching the particular duties of the wife, first we must note, that as marriage (among other principall things) was ordained for the generation of children, the wife in that respect is particularly called, and subiected to the charge of bearing children, to the paines in bringing of them into the world, and to the trouble and care to giue them sucke, and to nourish them in their infancie. As the first mother of all liuing creatures by her transgression, was bound thereunto for all her posteritie, by the ordinance of God: therefore as this consideration ought to make & moue a woman to liue humbly, as bearing in her paines and travels a brand of sin: so the same condition also ought to comfort her, (which S. Paul saith) That the woman shall be saued through bearing of children: for such is the pleasure of God, that the same which is the cause of much discommoditie and trauell to a woman, should bee turned to her good and saluation: for in that manner peaceably obeying her vocation, shee serueth her Creator, who by his infinite wisdom and goodnesse, ordained her by that meanes to bee brought to life eternall: so shee continueth in faith, loue, and holinesse with modestie, (as Saint Paul addeth.) But we must note by this word, to beare children, is also vnderstood to nourish and giue them sucke. God hauing giuen two breasts to a woman, not to set them out brauely for a shewe, but therewith to helpe her husband, by nourishing for a time the children proceeding from their bodies, and therein seruing God. For which cause he hath by nature ordained, that the blood which nourisheth the child in the mothers wombe, should bee conuerted into milk, which mounteth vp into the breasts, hauing two small nipples, to giue that sweete drinke to the childe, to the which also God giueth

giueth the industry and vnderstanding to sucke. Which teacheth vs, that the woman which can, and doth not giue her child sucke, refusing to doe the office of a mother, sheweth great ingratitude towards God, refuseth to aide her husband, and in a manner abandoneth the fruit of her owne wombe. Anna the wife of Elcana, that nourished Samuel her sonne vntill such time as he was weaned, is vnto them a good example. And Sara Abrahams wife also, as Moyles noteth in these words, (Who would haue said to Abraham, that Sara should haue giuen children sucke.) Wherunto also we must adde, that which was said to Christ, (happy is the wombe that beare thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked.) For as the first part of this sentence cannot but bee meant by the Virgin Mary, so like reason attributeth the rest to her, and from thence wee may draw, that shee gaue sucke to our Lord and Sauior Iesus Christ.

Touching the other duties of a wife, they are comprehended in this, to be subiect to her husband as to her head. It is the ordinance of God, (grounded as Saint Paul saith) vpon this that man was first created, that the woman, is of the man, and made by him, and that hauing bin deceived by the serpent, she seduced the man, This was the sentence pronounced by God vnto Eua, saying, Thy desire shal be subiect to thy husband, and he shal rule over thee. And the Apostle more plainly noteth this duty, saying: (Therefore as the Church is in subiection to Christ, euen so let the wiues be to their husbands in every thing.) For thereby he teacheth them, that as the Church intirely dependeth vpon the wisdom and will of Iesus Christ her Lord, and her spouse, so a woman should rule and gouerne herselfe in all things, by the wisdom and good pleasure of her husband; because he is her head, and she as his body, and that the conduction and guiding of the body, consisteth in the head and not in the body. For although there may be diuers women found, that are wiser then some men, (as the Scripture speaketh of Abigail and others:) and that not without good cause Salomon saith, A wise woman buildeth her house, & blessed is the man that hath a wise wife. Yet they must in such sort vse those graces giuen vnto them by God, that their husbands may thereby be honoured, and not dispised, neither by them nor by any others, in all their actions giuing their husbands that preheminence of superiority which of right belongeth vnto them. Vpon this discretion dependeth the obedience of the wife to her husband, as S. Peter noteth, by the example of Sara, who obeying Abraham, called him Lord. And S. Paul saith, Let the wife see that she feares her husband. For fearing to offend him, she will be carefull to yeeld obedience vnto him: for disobedience begetteth contempt: and contempt wrath & collar, as it appeareth in the history of Hester, from whence proceedeth great troubles in a family. But this obedience due vnto their husbands by them, must not passe the bounds of honor & holines (as S. Paul saith), Wives submit your selues vnto your husbands, as it is comely in the Lord. Lastly, the rest of the wiues duties are particular, as to keep at home in her house, to obserue and please the nature, inclination, and maners of her husband, which are not euil, to discouer vnto him her desires, and her secrets, to impart to him her paines and afflictions, & in all things to follow his counsell and aduice, and not to be addicted nor giuen to curiosnes in dresling of herselfe, nor in costly braue apparel, more then it pleaseth her husband. To conclude, piety and modesty are the precious ornaments of a woman, & cost not much to get them. And lastly, this sentence agreeth well with the subiect of our proposition, that those which are most curious to dresse and set out themselves for a brauery & shew to the world, are most negligent to adorne and decke their soules, with holines, as we noted before.

4. The particular duties of husbands.

Touching the particular duties of a Husband, first he must remember, that being created and ordained to be head ouer his wife, it is to guide and gouerne her with reason, wisdom, and lenitie, and not indiscreetly and roughly. For the creation of man, plainly and sufficiently teacheth vs, that all the parts in the head, as vnderstanding, iudgement, sight, hearing, and other gifts and graces of God; serue for the necessary and comfortable conduction and guiding of the body, and not to afflict it. For that is the true and naturall duty of the husband towards his wife, (as Saint Paul noteth) by the example of Iesus Christ, head of the Church, and Sauour of her body, from whence hee draweth this conclusion, That husbands ought to loue their wiues, as their owne bodies; for hee that loveth his wife, loveth himselfe: for (saith he) no man euer hated his owne flesh, but nourisheth it, and cherisheth it, euen as the Lord doeth the Church. An argument taken from nature it selfe, as if he should say,

It is a naturall thing for euery man to loue himselfe: And no man can loue himselfe, but he loueth his wife also. Therefore it is a thing against nature, when a man loueth not his wife. He proueth the minor of the argument thus, that marriage was ordained by God, to this end, that two should become one flesh, and to the end that this vinity might be esteemed more holy, he sheweth that it is compared to Christ and his Church. Then the duty of the husband is, so to loue his wife, that nothing should be neerer to his heart, then a louing care, to preserve and keepe her from all calamitie and miserie, and to finde the meanes to make her liue happily, and contentedly with him in the participation of all his goods and honours.

In this manner a wife and well aduised husband, will make a good harmony and accord, between his authority and loue, that so he may not abuse his authority, but rather vse both the one and the other, to the benefite and comfort of her, that is his faithfull partner. And from thence also will proceede, the effect of his duty to beare with his wifes infirmities, as also to forbear from dealing rigorously with her, whereof wee haue many good instructions in the holy Scriptures, specially in this where the Apostle saith: (Husbands loue your wifes, and be not bitter vnto them, and dwell with them as men of knowledge, giuing honour to the woman, as to the weaker vessell, as they which are heires together of the grace of life, that your prayers be not corrupted. For as the sickenes or weaknes of the body, prouoketh not the head to be angry therewith, to vexe it the more, but rather inciteth it to compassion and duty to succour and support it. So (if God hauing created the woman weaker and more subiect to frailty then man) hath ioyned her with him, and of two made one flesh, he did it not to the end, that beating her he should hurt her, but wisely to beare with her, and by that meanes peaceably to enioy that comfort and helpe which God by her giueth vnto him. Therefore hee should honour her, and graciously respect her, as she, who in her condition is a great comfort vnto him. As God himselfe hath pronounced, and whom he loued so much in Christ, that hauing beene redeemed with man, by his precious blood, shee is with him made heire of the kingdome of heauen. To this we must put the singular reason, which S. Peter addeth, of the humane and kind behauiour which man should shew to his wife, to the end saith he, that your prayers may not be interrupted. For God cannot be called vpon as they should, if their mindes be not peaceable and quiet, and holy prayers haue no place among debates & quarrels, yet this doth not argue, that a man neither can nor may tel, his wife of her infirmities and faults, for a correction vnto her, specially in things that displease God. But such telling & chiding should be lovingly rather to perswade then to force her, for with good words and moderate exhortations, (rather then by force) women are willinger moued to yeeld vnto their husbands. They must also be carefull by all the meanes and waies that they can, to remooue all blocks and stones, against the which women may chance to stumble, & take occasion of complaint, looking likewise into themselues, that they be not stained with the same faults and vices, which they blame in their wifes: but rather giue them good examples thereby to enduce and encourage them to follow their steps. As also that their reprehensions be done in secret, that the woman be not moued (with too great apprehension of her faults in company of others) which would easily prouoke her to reply, contradict, and stubbornely to contend with her husband.

For if it be an vnseemly thing in a man, to praise and commend his wife in company of other men, it is much more dangerous for him to reprove her openly. A learned Grecian willet husbands neither to flatter nor to chide their wifes in the the presence of strangers. And a Pagan Emperour said, That a wife husband which desireth to liue peaceably with his wife, ought to obserue three rules; that is, often to admonish her, seldome to reprove her, and neuer to beate her. An other speaking of the infirmities of women, saith, That the husband must take them away by faire meanes, or else beare with them patiently: and that he which can obserue the first point, shall thereby make the woman very commodious and fit for him, and that by the other, the man maketh himselfe better and more vertuous.

To conclude, the husband must consider, that as God made the woman, not of the head, to bee equall in authoritie with the man; so hee made her not of Adams foot, to be troden vpon and despised: But of one of his ribbes, to goe ioyntly with him, guided by reason. Whereby it appeareth, that the husband doeth not rule his wife, as the master doth his seruant, or a Lord his slaue, but as the Soule should gouerne the bodie, that is, with true loue, and holy affection, whereby hee is ioyned with her, in such manner, that all the dominion and commaundement which the husband hath ouer his wife, tendeth to this end, to procure ioy, profit, and contentment to his wife, in all honest and seemely things.

5. The conclusion of this Chapter.

For conclusion, let vs remember, that if the first blessing of God giuen to mariage taketh not the full force and effect thereof in this world so much corrupted, the reason is, that the order of nature established by God, hath bene subuerted by man; that if he had continued in his integritie, he would haue respected & loued his wife onely in God, as she also in him, wold haue bin a faithful companion, and both of them in such concord & sweet agreement (as also their posteritie) would haue continued, not onely in a holy, but also in a louing and peaceable societie. And that although Marriage hath bene corrupted by sinne, yet the goodnesse of God hath wrought so, that by his blessing they enioy many benefits, which daily encrease, as either of them are carefull, and take paines to doe their duties. And so, that it belongs to a wife louing her husband, and which delireth to doe her duetie to the Lord in her vocation, to studie and take care to obserue the duties afore said, that to her praise & commendation that may be said of her, which is written of Marriage, Blessed is the man that hath a vertuous wife, for the number of his yeares shall bee doubled. A vertuous woman is a good portion, which shall bee giuen for a gift vnto such as feare the Lord. Eccles. 26.1; 2.3. And for the husband, that as God hath shewed him singular grace and fauour, by making him an helpe like vnto himself, he ought alwaies to consider, how many waies his wife is an aid and comfort vnto him, the easilier to passe his life, that so the feeling of such a benefite, might induce him to giue thanks vnto the Lord, and make him disposed to vse it to his glorie, and for the consolation and saluation both of himselfe and his wife; constantly surmounting all difficulties and afflictions that happen in mariage, as not properly proceeding from that holy state of Matrimonie, but by accident, and by the corruption of the persons that are married. As also the husband must studie to restraine and correct his owne proper infirmities, and imperfections by amendment of life, and pray vnto God to giue the like grace vnto his wife: to the end that the neerer they approch to the diuine image of God, wherein they were first created, they may feele so much the more felicitie, and acknowledge how great and perfect the blisse of our first parents had bin, if they had continued in the same state of innocencie, Gene. 2.8. wherein God had placed them in terrestriall paradise.

The duties of Fathers and Mothers towards their Children, and of Children towards their Parents. Chap. 14.

1. It is a good family, when all the parts and members thereof, are well and wisely gouerned.

A wise Gracian sayde, that wee must not call a house a good house, because it is faire and sumptuously built, nor because it hath a great reuenue belonging vnto it, but it must be iudged in that respect, by the domesticall things and ornaments that are within it, that is the children, the wife, and the seruants: to whom the master of the house communicating and distributing part of that which he hath, they being wise and well conditioned, whether they dwell in a cellar, or vnder the shelter of a tree, it may bee tearmed a good and a happy house. In like sort, as from the head, the sinewes spring and haue their originall, and are the instruments of feeling and moouing, and that by them the braine sendeth the vitall spirits into all the parts of a mans body, without the which the members therof cannot vse nor exercise any natural faculty of feeling or moouing. So frō the father or master of the family, the other parts thereof ordinarily, receiue the custome of manners and conditions, specially when he is wise, well aduised, and vseth al the care, diligence, and industry that hee can, well and orderly to gouerne those whom God hath giuen him in charge to bring vp. Therefore, euery good gouernour, father or master of a family, ought to begin the right and true gouernment of his house from himselfe: shewing grauity, modesty, chastity, sobriety, peaceablenesse, piety, feare of God, and loue to his family, & by the effects of his duty, giuing good exāple to, & encouraging euery mēber therof, to labor, to doe well. But specially, and before all, he must haue a great care of his children, for that on them dependeth the principall discharge of his duetie towards God, and his countrey, together with the honor, reputation, and settling of his house in time to come, that is, when he instructeth and bringeth vp his children well, vertuously and Christian like; wherein the wife also is obliged to her husband, that so shee may obtaine, and merite the worthy name of a mother.

The first instruction of humane life is properly called discipline, which by litle and litle, and as it were by degrees moueth and stirreth vp the minds of children to piety & vertue; so that attaining to the age of discretion, they may bee able to know and doe that which the lawes of God and man commandeth. Which to effect, the first and surest meanes is, to imprint in the hearts of children, from their youthe vpwards, a loue, feare, and reuerence of their fathers and mothers, and therewith of God, teaching them to say the Lords prayer, which they must often repeat, as also the Creed, and the tenne Commandements of God. Thereby to frame and fashion them to know the Deitie, that waxing to riper yeares, they may by degrees comprehend the reason of that which they vse so often to recite: thereby to comfort them, and to receiue instruction for their saluations. And as the tongue is called the glory of man, because that by his speeche he is singularly discerned from bruite beasts: so it is requisite, that as soone as the child beginneth to speake, the tongue should be imploied to give glory vnto God, to call vpon him, and grounding it selfe vpon the principles of faith, to honour and serue him according to his will declared in his word. Then if the father and mother perceiue and see any vice whereunto their children are specially addicted, as to lying, chollor, melancholy, couetousnesse, pride, contempt of Father and Mother, promptnesse to fight, and such like corruptions, which naturally breede in all the posterity of Adam: they ought carefully in time to reprove and correct them for the same, as we vse to plucke vp weeds, before they are too deepe rooted, least they should grow vp among good herbes, and choake and spoile them. Wee see by experience, that when a woman swaddeleth her child, she hath a care to lay the legges, and other parts therof straight; and if it be giuen to vse the left hand, shee chides it, and bindes it vp, and otherwise restraineth it from the vse thereof, to teach it to vse the right hand. As also if it bee tongue tyed, she cuts the string, that it may not be hindred in the speeche: Then by greater reason parents must haue a speciall care and regard, that by their negligence or winckling at faults, their childrens soules may not be drawne awry, and that the interior vices thereof, may not encrease, but rather in the infancy begin to frame and fashion the spirit vnto vertue, remembring that which is commonly knowne to all men, which is, that when waxe is soft, you may the easilier set any marke or print vpon it, and when a bough being young and tender waxeth crooked, it may easily bee bowed and bent to make it straight. Fathers and mothers also ought to bee carefull, to learne their children to write and reade, it being a great helpe to passe their liues heere on earth, and a treasure much more worth vnto them, then great store of golde and silver: the principall intent whereof, ought to be to the end that they may reade, and reape profit by the holy word of God, and so comfort and instruct themselves, thereby to attaine a happy life. For which cause, they should vse them euery day to reade certaine chapters of the Bible, that so they may encline their affections to those diuine oracles, accustome themselves to the phrases of the holy Ghost, and by litle and litle learne the doctrine of life euerlasting.

Saint Athanasius to this purpose saith very well, (If thou wilt haue thy children to obey thee, acquaint them with the holy Scriptures, and it will be a great benefite vnto thee for them to reade and to heare the Word of God. For in it they learne, and are taught this Commandement, Honour thy Father and thy Mother. And a Pagan being asked, what things were best & fittest to teach children, sayd, You must learne them such things, as they haue neede and occasion to vse, when they are of elder yeeres. Then what toly is it, to teach and learne them vaine, light, and vnprofitable things, which when they attaine to riper yeeres, they either leaue or forgette; and not at all, or very little to instruct them in that, which they ought neuer to forsake, and which will make them liue when they are dead? Fathers & mothers ordinarily are carefull to teach their childre some kind of art, science or occupatiō, which they may vse & liue by whē they grow to mans estate, & therein they they doe well;) but as the soule is of greater worth, and dignitie then the body, so they are more bound to learne and instruct their children from their youtnes vppward, that which they are to practise all the dayes of their liues; that so they may yeeld vnto God that which belongeth vnto him, while they liue here on earth, and thereby be made heires of eternall life. These words which I command thee this day (saith Moses) shalbe in thine heart, thou shalt teach them diligently vnto thy children, and shalt talke of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou risest up. S. Paul commaundeth Christians to bring vp their children in instruction and information of the Lord. For if fathers and mothers, either for want of vnderstanding, or of will, take not occasion or leasure for themselves to teach their children that which concerneth their saluation, but vse to send them to Schole to learne liberall Arts and Sciences, and place them with such men as shall learne them that Occupation, which they would haue them to vse, that so they may haue a trade to liue by heere on earth, they can neuer excuse themselves, if their children be ignorant, or ill instructed in that which concerneth the glory of God, and the kingdome of heauen, for want of prouiding them good Teachers and Masters in that Science: and in trueth it concerneth them in this point to giue children good Masters, such as are wise, vertuous, and fearing God. For as the children partly follow the qualities of their parents or elders: so the vices of their Masters and Instructors are soone imprinted in their mindes. And therefore fathers ought to haue a great regard to keepe them from wicked and vicious company: for ordinarily wee see, that thereby they learne filthy dishonest speeches, and all kinde of corruptions: And for that an inclination to doe euill, is so much ingrafted in some children, that instruction by words is not sufficient for them; in that case they must proceed to chasten and correct them. God commaundeth it, and experience sheweth how necessary a thing it is, it being a notable and certaintestimony of true loue towards our children, and a desire that we haue of their good and saluation, when we take the paines to correct them.

Hee that spareth the rod, (saith Solomon) hateth his sonne: but hee that loueth him, chasteneth him betimes. Correct thy sonne, and hee will giue thee rest, and will giue pleasures to thy soule. Prou. 13.24. and 29.17.

It is true, that to those which are of a good nature, commendations when they doe well, and reproofe when they doe euill, are of greater efficacie and effect then blowes: for if praising incourageth them to vertue, chiding or reproofing restraineth them from vice. Likewise wee must not aske or require more of them, then their age permitteth, that thereby they bee not discouraged, and drawne to hate studie, and those honest exercises wherein they are imployed; it beeing requisite and conuenient to make and procure them to loue that which we desire they should learne and reape profite by. And therefore we must sometimes giue them leasure to play, and to recreate their mindes: for by moderate paines & trauel, they profit & wax skilful, but by ouer great labor they become dull and weary. Another dutie of fathers and mothers is, to bring vp their children peaceably with concord & amitie: for if discord and contention bee hurtfull in euery place, much more in a familie, there being nothing more perillous, nor easier to bring it to vtter ruine, then discord betweene brothers and sisters. And the auncient and true sentence verified, That by concord small things encrease, and by discord great things diminish and decay. Which is specially seene and found to take effect among children of one family.

Therefore, as neere as they can, they must loue, and vse them equally and alike, which is a great meanes to maintaine concord. Further, they must take great heed, that when children begin to grow to mans state, they haunt not such places, persons, nor exercises, whereby the wicked vice of fornication may seize vpon them. If betweene Amon and Thamar, 2. Sam. 13.

Dauids children, there happened a great inconuenience of iniquitie, how much more is it to bee feared, that by too much familiar conuersation betweene those that are not of kindred, or at least not so neere, they might commit the like offence? And againe, if the daughters of Shilo had not been permitted to go out to daunce, they had not been rauished by the Beniamites. Marriage is a remedie appointed by God, for auoiding of such vncleannesse: Iudg. 21.21.

Therefore, when a father and a mother haue honestly matched their childe, specially a daughter, by the happie band of Matrimonie to a husband, they haue discharged themselves of a great care. It belongeth to them to be diligent therein, lest their carelesseesse, difficultie, or choicenesse in foreseeing thereof, bee the cause of their childrens fault. And when they marrie them, let it bee in the Lord, (as Saint Paul saith) that is, not to giue them a husband, of whose pietie and Christian vertues, they haue not good testimonie, preferring those qualities before riches, and other worldly and carnall considerations. 1. Cor. 7.46.

For fathers and mothers ought to consider what inconueniences may arise by contracting matrimonie betweene persons of contrary Religion, or where one of the parties is more addicted to the world, then to that which belongeth to the kingdome of God. For it is to be feared, that the one would drawe and intice the other to doe euill, and to damne his soule, rather then the contrary. What troubles and contentions ordinarily rise by such alliances, so farre, that at the last they proceed to Diuorce, how small comfort and consolation is there betweene them; what little care mutually to pray to God in their family, and what negligence and hinderance to instruct their children in the feare and lawfull seruice of God? For if the fathers and mothers did duely set these things before their eyes, they would abhorre to thinke vpon such marriages. To make an end, we will adde two general points more to all the rest aforesaid: first, that they must bee examples and mirrors to their children of holinesse, and wisdom in all their words and works. Secondly, (and which is the principall) that they must pray earnestly euery day vnto God, that hee would bee pleased to guide them by his holy Spirit, in the government and instruction of their families, withall recommending their children vnto him, that hee may blesse their labours towards them. For by the first point, their instructions, exhortations, and corrections shalbe of greater efficacy, and authoritie: for to teach and instruct well, and to liue wickedly, is as much as to build an house with the one hand, and to pull it downe with the other. For experience sheweth, that men easily cast downe that which they set vp with languishing and paine. And the euill examples of fathers and mothers are like great cords to draw their children to follow them, which the Prophet Ezechiel sheweth, saying, I haue brought thy way vpon thine head, (saith the Lord God) behold all that vse Proverbs, shall vse this Proverbs of thee, saying, As the mother is, so is the daughter. Therefore it belongeth vnto those that will make their instructions of any valor, and effect, continually to approoue them by good life and honest conuersation. They must do like those that are guides, which shew the right waies and shallowes or foordes of riuers to those whom they leade and conduct safely on their journeyes. For by those meanes fathers and mothers shall bring their children to followe them, and to conforme themselves to their vertues, with them to bee made heires of saluation, and of eternall beatitude. By the second poynt, directing their prayers vnto the generall father both of them and their children, and from whom proceedeth all good graces and gifts, both temporall and spiritual, he will fill them with his blessings and graces, to profit in all things which shall bee necessary in their families, to the glory of that great God, and for the good and welfare of their posteritie.

3. Duties of children towards their fathers and mothers.

Touching the duties of children towards their fathers and mothers, we may consider of them as they are comprehended in the fift commandement of God, wherein it is sayd, Honor thy Father and thy Mother: a precept so much the more to bee marked, as it is often repeated and rehearsed in the holy Scriptures, and for that God hath specially added thereunto a promise of long life, vnto those that truly obserue it. For in truth, by this word (to honour) is signified, that loue, reuerence, respect, obedience, subiection, entertainment, or help and assistance in time of need, which children owe vnto their fathers & mothers: vpon which points all their other duties depend. Touching loue, it is cleerely confirmed by the sum of the second table of the law. Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe: wherein we must specially consider this, that fathers and mothers are not only neighbours to their children as other persons are, but neerer vnto them, in that they are the cause and subiect that they liue. Therefore it should be an extreame & most wicked ingratitude in children, not to loue their fathers and mothers, specially & before al others, seeing that next after God, they hold their being of them, together with a great number of continuall benefites, as also that the loue which they daily finde in them, notwithstanding the trauels, paines, and cares which they procure vnto their parents, bindes them by all reason, reciprocally to loue them: although it be a very difficult thing (if not altogether impossible) that children can so much loue their fathers and mothers as they loue them. As the prouerbe saith, that loue descendeth, rather then ascendeth. But this is cerraine, (as an ancient father saith, that if you take away the beames of the sunne, it will shine no more, the currant of a fountaine it will dry vp, a branch of a tree and it will wither, a member from a body and it will rotte, so take away the loue of children from their fathers and mothers, and they

they will cease to be their children, to become brethren and companions vnto those, to whom Iesus Christ said, you are children of the Diuell. This loue ought specially to shew it selfe in the care, desire, and affections which children ought to haue, to ministeriõy and contentment vnto those that begot them, that is, by liuing vertuously, according to their Discipline, and taking care to giue them no cause of sorrow and griefe by doing euill. Therefore Solomon admonisheth them, saying, A wise sonne maketh a glad father, but a foolish sonne is a heauinesse to his mother, and a foolish sonne is a griefe vnto his father, and a heauinesse vnto her that bare him. Againe, this loue ought to be accompanied, with reuerence and respect, as the name of father, proper vnto God (as Iesus Christ said) bindeth children thereunto. For in that, those that brought them into the world are called fathers, they beare towards them the title and image of God. As the example of Salomon sheweth, who vnderstanding that Bathsheba his mother came to speak with him, notwithstanding, his regall estate, role vp to meete with her, to doe reuerence vnto her, and set her downe on his right hand. Which duty we must not only shew exteriorly, but also in heart, in all our affections and works, to honor and esteeme of our fathers and mothers, & neuer to despise them, no not in their infirmities, nor yet suffer the to be despised of others, without shewing griefe and displeasure for the same. From thence also proceedeth the subiection and obedience which we acknowledge to be due vnto them, (as Saint Paul sayth,) Children obey your fathers and mothers in the Lord, for this is right, Honor thy father and mother which is the first Commandement with promise, that it may be wel with thee, and that thou maist liue long on earth. Saint Luke noteth, that Iesus Christ was subiect to his mother, and to Ioseph his reputed father. And Saint Paul sayth, that although Iesus Christ was in forme of God, and thought it no robbery to be equall with God, yet he made himselfe of no reputation, and tooke on him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient vnto God his Father even to the death of the crosse. Wherefore we ought to be resoluẽd, that in this obedience due to fathers and mothers, there is nothing that is troublesome or difficult, and that there is no greatnes nor excellencie of estate, which children should not spare to lay downe and leaue, to doe their duty vnto those that begat them, nor any kind of abiection or oproby no nor death, wherein they should feare to fall to serue them. But rather to endure also whatsoeuer, then to offend them, by disobedience and contempt.

Children (saith the Apostle) obey your parents in all things, (adding for a reason) for that is well pleasing vnto the Lord. Whereby hee taketh away all replies that may be made against the same. And accordingly Moses saith, You shall feare euery one his mother and his father: for whosoever loueth them, feareth to offend them by despising their authoritie and commaundements. It is true, that this obedience and subiection ought to be holy, and in the Lord, (as Saint Paul saith,) for otherwise this Apostolical rule is altogether and alwayes inuolable, (that it is a iust thing before God, to obey him rather then men.)

Acts 4. 19.

But this restraineth not children from not obeying their commaundements, which are contrary to the glory of God, nor hindreth them not from continuing to loue, honour and respect their fathers and mothers, whatsoeuer they be, wicked or heretikes: for as the law of nature, (which is inuolable) is not annihilated by the vices of men, (because they cease not still to be men:) so wicked and peruerse fathers and mothers continually and for ever retaine and hold their right ouer their children, to be honored and respected while they are fathers: and also to commaund, and to be obeyed: so it be not in any thing which is forbidden by the Father of all men. Lastly, it is the duetie of children, to comfort their fathers and mothers in their afflictions, to supply their wants, and to ayde and helpe them in all things that they haue need of. Wherein they shall but pay a part of their debts, being thereunto most firmly bound by the benefites which they haue first receiued from them that brought them into the world. To this duetie, S. Paul expressly bindeth them, saying, If any widowes haue children, or nephewes, let them learne first to shew godlinesse towards their owne house, and to recompence their kindred. As their fathers and mothers, and ancestors; for that is an honest thing and acceptable before God. Further, in this point whereof wee speake, we must make no smal account of the promise which God addeth to the commaundement, to honor father & mother, which is, That thy dayes may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. For herein it is clearly shewed, how much God esteemeth & respecteth the honor & obedience that childre giue to their fathers & mothers. It is true, that God spake properly to the Israelites of the land which he had promised to giue the for an inheritance, & which should be vnto them as a witnes of his goodnes & loue toward the. It being as much as if he should haue said vnto them, to the end that living long in that land, you shall in tract of time, by experience feele and finde the benefits of my graces and fauours towards you. But from thence we gather this thing more, that now seeing all the earth is blessed vnto the faithfull, the promise to liue long therein, is a particular blessing of God vnto vs. First, because wee cannot liue long time, without being participants of diuers great benefits receiued from God by his diuine prouidence, in regard of this terrestriall life: and secondly, because it is a better meanes for good and honest men, to imploy themselues the longer time to serue him, for whose glory they were borne, and wherein they ought to thinke themselues happy. For to the contrary it happeneth oftentimes, that God taketh his best seruants, and most obedient children soone out of the world. But in this, and all other the like points, where God promiseth vs terrestriall benefits, we must vnderstand his promise with this condition, that is, so farre forth as it shall bee expedient for our spirituall good and saluation: For if that were not so, there were nothing but miserie in long life, and in all the greatest benefits that wee enioy in this world.

4. Conclusion of this Chapter.

For a summarie conclusion of this Chapter, let vs obserue, that as Saint Paul calleth the family of Philemon, The Church, and that also of Priscilla and Aquila: so all fathers and mothers, are bound in such manner to gouerne their children and seruants, that their houses may be as little Churches: From whence (according to Davids protestation) all vices and all manner of corruptions should be banished, and driven away, that their dwelling may be holy, and God therein praised, serued, worshipped, and called vpon, morning, and euening, and at meale times, and euery hoare in the day. For families so gouerned, shall finde and feele the truth of the promises of God, and that he will be in the middle of them, as in his Temple, to blesse them with the graces which hee vncessantly powreth downe vpon his elect, and all the faithfull. And it belongeth vnto children (as Ecclesiastes saith) to heare their fathers iudgements, that they may be safe: for the Lord will haue the father honoured of the children, and hath confirmed the authoritie of the mother ouer the children. Hee that feareth God, honoureth his parents, and doth honour to his parents, as to his Lords, that hee may haue Gods blessing, and that his blessing may abide with him for euer. For the blessing of the father, establisheth the house of the children: and the mothers curse rooteth out the foundation. And if a Pagan did acknowledge, that there is no prayer which God more willingly heareth, then that of a Father made vnto him for his children, by great reason, those that are Christians, ought to feare the curse of their fathers and mothers, for their offences, and to seeke the meanes (by honouring them) rather to be blessed by their praiers: For without doubt such blessings shall be ratified in heauen, as those which Isaac gaue to his sonne Iacob esidently declare.

The duties of Magistrates towards their subiects, and of subiects towards their Magistrates: of Pastors or Ministers towards their flocks, and of their flocks towards them. Chap. 15.

1. The duties of Kings, Princes, and Magistrates.

WE must heere say something of the duties of Kings, Princes, Magistrates, and others, which Saint Paul calleth superiour powers. And of that duetie also, which their subiects owe vnto them. And by the same means (to accomplishe our first treatie of Christian Phylosophie,) give a taste of the duties of Pastors, or Ministers towards their Churches, and of their Congregations towards them. For (as wee said before) our intent is not fully and at large to speake of these excellent things; for then wee should make a great volume thereof, but onely of as much as shall suffice, to performe that which in the beginning wee promised; that is, of the true meanes to attaine to a happie life in every vocation. Touching the first point, all Magistrates desiring duely and truly to fulfill the duties belonging to their charge, ought to remember that God hath called and placed them in that authoritie, not for their owne particular profit and honour, but to the end that they should serue

Rom. 13. 1.

serue him, by procuring the good and benefite of his people, of whom hee giueth them the gouernement. That is it which the Apostle meaneth, saying, That the Prince is the Minister of God, for the good of all men; which hee confirmeth in an other place more particularly, declaring, that the end of the vocation of kings, and of all those that are in authoritie, is, that wee may leade a quiet and a peaceable life, in all godlinesse and honestie. These are three notable points wherein consisteth the whole summe of the duetie of their charge; for that pietie comprehendeth Religion, and the seruice of God, peace and tranquillitie, the fruits of Iustice and Iudgement: and by honestie is vnderstood, modestie of manners, and all vertues requisite to liue ciuilly and vprightly.

Rom. 13. 4.
1. Tim. 2. 2.

This Booke of the Lawe (saith God to the Prince of his people) (Shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou maiest obserue and do according to all that is written therein: for then shalt thou make thy waies prosperous, and then shalt thou have good successe. So the duetie of all Magistrates is, to bee well instructed in the trueth and will of God, to liue accordingly, and to cause all their subiects to doe the like: that so they may prosper in this world, and enioy the happie estate of life eternall. Which is so singular and speciall a poynt, that all the parts, graces and perfections, which the great politions, both Philosophers, and Christians could ever desire to bee in a compleate Prince, may be comprehended in this duetie onely: for from it proceedeth integritie of religion, and the beneuolence or good will of the people, which are two firme pillars of euery well established estate and Common wealth. For to the same wee may referre the three principall offices and actions required in a King, that is, to rule and gouerne by good Lawes and examples, to nourish his people, and iudge them by wisdom, providence, and iustice, and to keepe and defend his countrey and subiects, by valour, care, and vigilancie. And that also is the meaning of those, that in a Prince, require holinesse in time of peace, force and magnanimitie in warre; and in both of them wisdom and prudence, that hee may specially remember, that he beareth the Image of God, in regard of his office, (as Magistrates in the Scripture are oftentimes called Gods) that hee may not say or doe any thing against the diuine Maiestie, and that hee may vse iustice and clemency, following the example of God, infinitely iust and benigne: Which hee should be especially moued vnto, by this sentence of the Prophet, That he must die like other men, in thinking that hee is called to his charge, as well to praise God, as to command others.

Ioshua 1. 8.

And in Iulius Pollux, euery man may see, (by the titles and points which he desireth to be in a prince,) diuers notable instructions to teach them to frame themselves to the same duties. Who would haue him to be the father of the people, milde, gracious, wise, iust, courteous, magnanimous, a dispiser of mony, a commander of himselfe, surmounting all passions, and vices, vling good reason and iudgement, sober, religious, louing his subiects, constant, no deceiver, holding his word, ready to doe good, slow to reuenge, a lover of the vertuous, desirous of peace, valiant in warre, an example of good maners, a maker of good lawes, and an obseruer of the same.

Ibid. 7.

But Saint Augustine proceedeth further in this matter, saying: The iustice of the king is, not to oppresse any man by power, to iudge iustly without exception between man & man, to be a protector of strangers, orphans, & widdows, an impeacher of thefts, a punisher of adultery, no aduancer of vicious men, no intertainer of quarelling and licentious fellows, an exterminator of wicked persons, vigilant to put murderers & periured persons to death, a maintainer of Churches, a nourisher of the poore, a planter of vpright and honest men in publike offices, one that chuseth ancient, sober, and wise counsellors, no harkener to diuiners, magicians, and euil spirits, not chollerike, a defender of his countrey against enemies with magnanimity and iustice, putting his whole trust in God, not proud in prosperity, patient in aduersity, an vpholder and maintainer of the Catholike faith, no fauourer of wickednes in his children, imploying certain howers in the day to pray vnto God, & one that eateth not but when necessity requireth, (according to the saying of Ecclesiastes) woe be to thee, oh land, when the gouernors eate early in the morning. These things (saith this good father) giue prosperity to this life, and leade the prince to a better kingdome, that is, heavenly and eternall. A perfect table of the duty and office of magistrates, who among other things may thereby learne, that their authority shall much encrease, and be of great effect, when their power is accompanied with many graces and vertues, more then are in their subiects, thereby to serue vnto them for examples in all things that are conuenient for the children and seruants of God: Wherin they ought to be carefull, that they do not permit nor suffer them selues, which may any way be tolerable in others, much more ought they not to dispenwith themselves therein, by any meanes. As we may note by diuers testimonies and examples, that (God euen in the greatest personages) punished certaine faults, which in outward apparence were very small, as of Moses and Aaron, who because they did not strike the Rocke, that the water might come forth, with such an assurance of the power of God, as in that case was requisite, they were bard from entring into the Land of Canaan: of Da-uid for numbring his people, for the which 70. thousand of them died of the plague:

 and of Ezechias for shewing his treasure to the Ambassadors of the King of Babylon, for the which he lost his riches, and his people were led into Captiuitie.

Wee must further note, that as it is the duty of Magistrates to give good examples to their Subiects: so they should persevere and continue therein, because their state is slippe-rie. For as trees that grow in high places, are more subiect to stormes and beating of the winde, and consequently in greater danger to be blowne downe, then others that stand lower: So Kings and Princes raised to high degrees aboue their Subiects, are puissantlier assailed, either by the diuell, which knowes the great importance of their fall; or else by Cicophants, and euill counsellors through the feeling of their owne greatnesse (prouoked thereunto by the corruptions, concupiscences, and vices which are naturall to all flesh) which makes them inclined to all kinde of lasciuiousnesse; and therefore they ought to know, and often meditate thereon, that there is nothing more difficult then wisely to gouerne and raigne ouer others, that they may daily pray vnto God, for that wisdom and perseuerance which is necessarie for them, in their duties, by his diuine blessing as Salomon did.

2. The duties of Subiects towards their Magistrates.

Concerning the duties of the common people, and Subiects towards their Princes and Magistrates, it is certaine, that as in the fift precept of the Law, God commandeth vs to honour our Fathers: vnderstanding by that name of Fathers, all Superiours that haue any charge or command ouer others, and consequently Magistrates: So the word to Honor containeth in it all offices and duties whereunto inferiour persons and subiects are bound in respect of their Princes and Gouvernours: Which Saint Peter confirmeth saying, Honor the King: by the which he teacheth vs; all that which the Scripture commandeth touching the Loue, Reuerence, Subiection, Obedience, and aide which wee are bound to shew and giue to our Superiours; as also, that wee ought to pray for them, that God might blesse and prosper them.

1 Peter 2. 17.

For the first point, if wee are bound to loue our neighbours as our selues; specially, because of the Image of the Deitie, which all the posteritie of Adam beare, how much more then Kings and Princes, which are as it were, our Fathers, and that beare a particular Image of God, in that they are his Lieutenants to rule and gouerne his people. I haue said you are Gods, and children of the most high, (saith Danid) speaking of Magistrates. Then wee are bound to this duetie, to loue, as also to reuerence them with heart, affection, words and workes: otherwise it is a despising of God in them, because there is no power but of God, and the powers that be, are ordeined of God, (as the Apostle saith) and thereupon maketh this most true and certaine conclusion, Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist, shall receiue to themselves condemnation.

Psalm. 82. 6.

Rom. 13. 1, 2.

1 Pet. 2. 13.
 Rom. 13. 5.

And from thence we are also taught, what subiection and obedience we ought to yeeld vnto our Princes, according to the exhortation of S. Peter, saying, Therefore submit your selues vnto all maner of ordinance of man for the Lords sake, whether it be vnto the kings as vnto the superior, &c.

1 Pet. 2. 18.

And to that end Saint Paul saith, that we must be subiect to the Magistrates, not because of wrath onely, but for conscience sake. Whereby we learne, that although we may scape punishment of the prince, for disobeying him, yet that we must not refuse to obey his com-mandements, alwaies remembring, that God is offended therein, because wee disobey those whom he hath placed to be superiours ouer vs hereon earth. And which is more, as S. Peter admonisheth seruants to be subiect vnto their masters, with all feare, not onely to the good and curteous, but also to the froward. So subiects are bound to obey their Magistrates, though they be infidels, wicked, and Idolaters, as they were that ruled in the Apostles time:
 And whom they commaunded Christians to obey, for as Christian Religion doth not overthrow

ouerthrow the order of politicke government, to the iniquity and wickednesse of Princes, doth not in any sort deprive them of their right and authoritie of commanding, neither yet exempteth Subiects from their dutie of obedience, nor simplie as vnto men; but as to God, whose image and authoritie they beare. It is true, that God doth not thereby lose any part of his owne authority, nor doth dispence with vs, from obeying him, in obeying the Magistrate. For seeing that they haue no authoritie nor power, but onely that which is given them from aboue (as Iesus Christ saith) it is not conuenient that to obey their commandements, wee should not do the commandements of God, for that without authority from him, they haue no power to command. And seeing that it is for the loue of God, (as Saint Peter saith) that wee owe subiection vnto them, wee must not obey them, to the preiudice of that loue, which is the fountaine of good workes, as the Apostles constantly shewed, and maintained before the Governours of the Iewes, saying vnto them. Judge you whether it bee right in the sight of God, to obey you rather then God. John 19. 11. Acts 4. 19.

Again, all Subiects are bound in time of neede to aide and assist their Magistrates, as well with their bodies, as with their goods: with their bodies, by bearing armes vnder the authoritie and commandement of their Princes, to aide and helpe him in the execution of his office, as also to defend him from all outrages and villanies: And with their goods, to the ende, that the Magistrate which emploiet his time and labour, for the good and benefite of the Common wealth, should haue such reuenues as are fit and necessarie for his estate and dignitie, and as it were in manner of a remuneration and salarie for his paines taking therein. As also that hee may bee furnished with money to defray the charges and expences necessarie for the conseruation and intertainement of the Monarchie and Common wealth, committed to his charge. To that end, Kings and Princes are authorised by God, to impose and take tribute, tallages, subsidies, costomes and impositions of their Subiects, and the Subiects are bound to pay it, and to furnish them therewith: which the Apostle teacheth: as also Christ himselfe commandeth it, and confirmeth the same by an example, in paying tribute due vnto Cesar. Rem. 13. 8. Math. 22.

Lastly, hearken what Saint Paul speaketh of another dutie belonging vnto subiects, saying, I exhort therefore, that first of all, Supplication, Prayers, Intercessions, and giving of thanks, bee made for all men: For Kings, and for all that are in authoritie, that wee may leade a quiet and peaceable life, in all godlinesse and honellie. And in truth, this charge of Magistrates (touching publike tranquillitie and holinesse) euidently sheweth, how much wee are bound vnto that dutie, to pray vnto God for them, that they may bee ledde and strengthened by his Spirit, with all necessarie grace to effect the dutie and ende of their vocation. As in truth also, in those prayers and spirituall exercises, consisteth the best and most profitable seruice, that Princes are to expect and desire of their good Subiects, according to the example of Dauid, who being a King, according to Gods owne heart, and abundantly endued with his graces, neuertheless, knowing what neede hee had of the prayers of the people, to that effect, made that notable prayer for them to vse, which wee finde in the 20. Psalm.

3. Duties of Pastors or Ministers toward their flockes.

Now let vs say something of the duties of pastors or ministers, we may reduce them all to the speciall head and end of their vocations, and to that which is requisite to attaine thereunto. That is, to saue the soules of the faithfull, redeemed by the precious blood of Iesus Christ, as Saint Paul saith to his Disciple, for although that God onely is the Saviour, it pleaseth him neuertheless, to vse the ministry of men for the accomplishing of their saluation, in such manner, that the Apostle for that consideration, calleth ministers of the Gospell, coadiutors, and fellow labourers with God. Whereunto also we must referre, that which he saith els where, that he therefore gaue some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Euangelists, and some Pastors and teachers, for the repairing of the Saints, and for the worke of the ministry, and for the edification of the body of Christ. From whence wee learne, that for the accomplishing of the end of their vocation, their first and singular duty is, to preach the word of God, which Saint Paul for that cause calleth, the power of God vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueth. And in another place, to the like end, earnestly recommendeth the same duty to Timothy, and in him to all the pastors and ministers of the Church;

Church. And as all professions and arts are known by the workemen that vse the same: as a Taylor by cutting out and sowing of apparell, a shoemaker by making of shoes, A phisition because he imployeth his time and study, to heale and cure those that are diseased, and so of others. So a Bishop, Pastor, or a Minister is knowne, by preaching and pronouncing the word of God, and that by the same he comforteth the hearts of the afflicted, exhorteth the slacke and negligent, strengtheneth the feeble, and encourageth those that are cast downe by affliction, and such as are strayed from the truth, which hee doth not lightly, & as it were for order sake, but carefully, diligently, and constantly. As the Apostle protesteth of him- selfe, that both night & day for the space of three yeares together, he ceased not with teares to admonish every one. It is the office also of a Pastour or Preacher to minnister the Sacraments vnto the people, and to celebrate the same faithfully, to the glory of God, and the edification of the Church: as likewise he is bound to haue such a care of his flocke, as well generally as particularly, that hee must visite them in their sicknesse, miseries, and anguishes, to strengthen them in faith, and patience, providing as neere as he can, that they may be aided and succored in their necessities and wants. And for that no man is able of himself to execute so great and weighty a charge. And that the graces, gifts, and labors of those that are most able therein, are vnprofitable and vnfruitfull without the speciall blessing of God, every faithfull minister ought to employ his mind oftentimes, with an ardent and singular zeale to pray vnto God, that he wil endow him with his spirit, and daily encrease his graces in him for the accomplishing of his vocation.

Acts. 20. 31.

Ephes. 6. 19.

Saint Paul so excellent an Apostle, and a chosen vessell to preach the glory of God to the Gentiles, was not content continually to pray vnto God, but also recommended himselfe to the prayers of the faithfull, to the end that utterance might bee giuen vnto him, and that hee might open his mouth boldly, to publish the secret of the Gospell, and to speake as he should.

1 Cor. 3. 6.

Againe, a Minister ought by praier to beseech God that hee would blesse his labour, that it might take effect and force among his flocke, and that generally and particularly, hee would bee pleased to keepe and preserue them all, and encrease his graces in the vniuersall Church. And to that ende, the Apostle saith, That hee had planted, and Apollo watered, but that it is God which giueth the encrease. And wee see in all his Epistles, what diligence and zeale hee sheweth to recommend the assemblies of the faithfull, and diuers particular persons vnto the Lord. Which are as many notable considerations for ministers to thinke vpon, that they may spend their time carefully to pray vnto the Lord, as also that it is the principall meanes to nourish and encrease pietie, a good conscience, ardent zeale, charitie, diligence, and fidelity in them. All which are qualities wherewith the true Ministers of Christ, and of his Church, ought to seale and confirme their doctrine, that by conuersation and conformity of life according to their doctrine, they may bee good examples, and an edification to their flockes. As Saint Paul saith to Timothee, Vnto them that beleuee, bee an example in word, in conuersation, in lone, in spirit, in faith, and in purenesse. As hee addeth also vnto Titus, and as Iesus Christ saith vnto his Apostles,

1 Tim. 4. 12.

Titus 2. 7.

Matth. 5. 14.

You are the lightes of the world, Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good workes and glorifie your father which is in heauen. For as when it is night, we cause one to goe before vs with a light to shew vs the way: so in the darkenesse of the soule, wherein wee are borne, the liues and behauiours of our Pastors, and spirituall Fathers, ought to serue for burning torches to conduct and guide vs in the way of saluation and eternall life. Which they ought specially to practise, wholly abandoning those vices which are condemned and forbidden by the word of God; specially, Auarice, and Ambition, for which cause Saint Paul saith, That a Bishop must bee vnpromisable, the husband of one wife, watching, temperate, modest, sober, apt to teach, not giuen to wine, no striker, not giuen to filthy lucre, but gentle, no fighter, nor couetous. Which Saint Peter confirmeth also. And to take away all occasions for a Minister to become ambitious, by presumption and desire of glory: The Apostle saith thus, For who separateth thee? And what hast thou, that thou hast not receiued? If thou hast receiued it, why reioicest thou as though thou hadst not receiued it? Whereby the Apostle teacheth Ministers to know, that God communicateth his graces vnto them, not to puffe them vp in pride, but to the ende, that in their modestie and humilitie, hee onely may by them bee exalted and glorified: for the good and saluation of those, whom he hath committed to their charge.

1 Tim. 3. 3.

1 Pet. 5. 2.

4. Duties of Christian people to their Pastors.

Touching the duties of Christian people towards their Pastors, seeing they are also understood by the word Father, in the first Commandment of the Law of God: It followeth, that in the word Honor, is also comprehended all the duties of the faithful towards them: that is, Love, reverence, subiection, obedience, and assistance in time of neede: For the first, If wee ought to love all men; and namely, our enemies: by greater reason wee ought to love those whom God vseth and imployeth to beget vs in Christ; that wee may be his children, and heires of his kingdome of heauen. It is said of the Galatians, that they bare so great an affection to Saint Paul, that hauing receiued him as an Angell of God, yea as Iesus Christ, they would willingly, (if need had beene) haue pild out their eyes, to haue given them vnto him. A true signe of a singular love, because that is more, then for a man to giue his goods, or his life for an other. This cordiall love cannot chuse but beget a certaine respect towards Ministers: In consideration of the honorable charge whereunto they are called by God, being made Stewards of the secrets and misteries of eternall saluation, Gods Ambassadors for Iesus Christ, bringing the message, and glad tidings of our reconciliation, coadiutors and fellow-laborers with God for our eternall good, and ministers of the new alliance in spirit and life eternall. For all these titles which the holy Scriptures giue to Pastors and Ministers of the Church, evidently shew, what reuerence and respect Christian people, ought to yeeld vnto them, and that no man ought to despise them, without despising Christ in them, (as he himselfe teacheth) and so become too vnthankful for the benefits, which God by them offereth vnto all the faithful. But specially we must love & respect them, when they imploy themselves faithfully in their charge as by the titles aforesaid they are admonished, & bound therunto. From thence also proceedeth the subiection & obedience which is due vnto them, as the Apostle commandeth the Hebrews, saying, Obeie them that haue the oversight of you, & submit your selues (adding this reason) That they watch for your soules, as they that must giue account, that they may doe it with ioy, and not with griefe. Which subiection and obedience consisteth specially in three points: the first, carefully to heare the word preached, to communicate the Sacraments, and to bee assistant at publike prayers; the second, to bring forth fruites, and shew forth the effects of those holy exercises; and thirdly, modestly and humbly to receiue their instructions, reprehensions, and admonitions. Lastly, there is an aiding and assisting due to Pastors, and Ministers, as well with our meanes, (that they may haue a convenient intertainment and allowance for their maintenance) as with our prayers vnto God, that hee will bee pleased to preserve and blesse them. To the first point, marke what S. Paul saith, Who goeth a warfare any time at his owne costs & charges? Or who feedeth a flocke, and eateth not of the milke of the flocke? Againe, Let him that is taught in the word, make him that hath taught him partaker of all his goods. To prooue the second point, in almost all the Epistles which the Apostle writeth (Although he was endued abundantly with the gifts of the holy Ghost,) he exhorteth the particular Churches, incessantly to pray vnto God for him. And seeing that Christ commandeth vs, to pray the Lord of the harvest to raise vp laborers, or workemen therein, it followeth, that when he hath giuen vs those that are good, we ought to giue him thanks for them and continue our vows and prayers vnto him, to desire him that he will bee pleased to preserve and keepe them, for the aduancement of his glory, and our edification.

5. Conclusion of this Chapter.

For conclusion of that which wee said before, seeing that all Superior power commeth from God, and likewise the distinction of the order and degrees thereof: Let euery man haue a care to looke vnto his vocation, to walke therein as the Lord hath appointed him. Let Magistrates that are desirous to amend their liues, examine themselves, touching the points of their duties herein specified; that so correcting and amending their owne fautes, they may imploy their minds more and more to gouerne their subiects holily and vprightly: that God may bee glorified, and they and their Subiects attaine euermore happines. Let those that are borne to obey, love and reuerence their Superiors, yeelding voluntary subiection vnto them, and imploy both their bodie and goods to aide and serue them, being assured that doing so, and praying vnto God for them they shall liue happily vnder their their conduction. Let Pastors and Ministers often reade and meditate that which Saint Paul writeth to the Bishops or Ministers of Ephesus, and generally all his Epistles, from him, and his writings, to take and draw a patterne of all that which is requisite for the vocation of a faithfull Minister of the Church of God, remembering the promise of the holy Ghost, That euerie one shall receive his wages according to his labour, and that those which turne many to righteousness shall shine as the starres for euer and euer. Let all the faithfull acknowledge how precious those spirituall benefits are, which wee receive by the Ministrie of our Pastors, and that for sowing such rich treasures in our soules: It is a small matter that they reape our carnall riches. And lastly, in consideration thereof and of the most honourable and holy charge which God hath giuen vnto them for vs, we must loue them with an vp-right heart, and in all respects obey them, and haue a care of them, specially in our prayers, that the Lord both of them and vs, may preserve and fill them with the graces of his holy Spirit, for his glory, and the aduancement of the saluation of the Church.

That by seuen causes and diuine reasons, a true Christian Philosopher should be induced to embrace all the meanes of a happy life, set downe in this Philosophie, specially by that which hath bene said, by our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, that the kingdome of heauen is at hand. Chap. 16.

1. Seuen principall causes and reasons more then sufficient to make a man forsake, and amend all his follies and corruptions.

NOW we come to the end and intent of the first part of our Christian Philosophie, touching the meanes of a happy life, wherein if wee haue not proceeded so well as wee desire, we haue at the least done as well as wee could, by the measure of the diuine graces, which God hath bestowed vpon vs. But before wee passe to the second part & prooue of this Academicall Theologie, as we began generally to frame the actions of the soule to the loue of pietie, & righteousness, grounding vpon this foundation of the words of Iesus Christ, Amend your liues, and shewed that we ought specially and principally to practise this commandment of the Lord, in regard of seuen pernicious follies whereunto we are naturally enclined, thereby to leaue and forsake them, limiting and bounding our other discourses, with the number of seuen. In like manner, to moue and stirre vp our mindes with greater zeale to embrace the admonition of our Saviour, and to liue holily and vp-rightly. Wee will herein set downe seuen principall causes, and diuine reasons, by the which all Christians in generall, and euery one of them in his particular vocation ought to be touched by the Spirit of God in their hearts, and also feele and confesse themselves to be specially bound to a true and perfect amendment of their liues, and to bring forth the fruits of repentance. For as wee haue already said, If the number of seuen, commonly signifying perfection, is sufficient in our discourse to shew, that man is altogether ignorant and a foole, vntill such time, as becomming wise and vnderstanding, hee leaueth his follies. So the like number of reasons taken out of the holy Scriptures, concerning the same subiect, and matter of amendment of life, shall suffice to induce (euery man that is worthy of the name of a Christian Philosopher) vnto the same.

2. The first cause of amendment of life is the authoritie of Iesus Christ.

For a first cause to moue vs to amendment of life, we haue the authority of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, who commandeth vs to doe it. For the onely commandment of him, being the Son of the eternall God, saying, Amend your liues, ought to leade and induce vs to yeeld ready and voluntary obedience vnto him. And the names and titles which he hath, sufficiently declare and shew his authority vnto vs. First, it is the Sonne of God, (who in the preface of the law, receiued by Moses, exercising the office of a Prophet, a King, and a conductor of the elect people of the Iewes) that spake, saying, I am the eternall Lord, thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. From whence wee may draw a double reason of his authoritie, which bindeth vs to obey him. First, from the name of eternall, which in the Hebrew tongne is called Iehoua, which signifieth, Essence, or He that is, as in him, and by him onely we are, we liue, and have our mooring. And as the Apostle witnesseth; That all things were created in Christ, or by him, and that they also consist by him. The second reason is, in that he addeth thereunto, Thy God, to signifie to the Children of Israel, that they were his peculiar people, redeemed by him, and therefore dedicated and consecrated to his diuine Maiesie, as mention is there presently made, of their deliverance out of the Land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage; for a certaine testimony of the love of God towards his people, and of a resurrection and reestablishment of a free and a happy life. Whereby wee learne the two fold and double right, belonging vnto the Lord, commanding vs this day to amend our liues, as our Creator and Redeemer, and that therefore it should bee a monstrous double ingratitude, not to obey him, who declaring his will vnto vs, in the first object letteth vs plainly see, that we cannot subsist, neither corporally nor spiritually, neither in this life, nor in the life to come, without his power and grace. Which teacheth vs how we must reape profit and instruction from this, that since the Law of Moses, wee haue had the accomplishment of the same, and of all the shadowes and figures thereof, in Iesus Christ our Saviour manifested in the flesh, hauing beene deliuered from the power of darkenesse, and in him obtained redemption through his blood. That is, forgiveness of sinnes: and therefore wee acknowledge and confesse him in the Creed, to be our Lord. And Saint Paul calleth him The onely Prince, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords. And therefore King of all the world, in such manner neuerthelesse, that hee is also and specially King of his Church, as Dauid saith, That he which dwelleth in the heauens, hath set his King upon Zion his holy mountaine. And therefore wee conclide for the first cause of amendment of our liues, that all those names and titles of Iehoua, Creator, Redeemer, Saviour, Lord, and King, which he beareth, that enioineth and chargeth vs to conuert and turne vnto him, being considered as they ought to be; shew vnto vs, what authority he hath to command vs, which is most sacred and inuiolable, whereby we are most firmly bound vnto him, as his creatures, children, subiects, and seruants.

3. The second reason of amendment, is, the name of Holy attributed to Christ.

The Prophet Esay saith, that he saw the Lord sitting upon his Throane, with many Seraphins, about it, crying one vnto the other, Holy, Holy, Holy: is the Lord of Hosts, the whole world is full of his glory, which is said of Iesus Christ, as S. Iohn witnesseth, reciting, in an other place, That in a vision which appeared vnto him, he saw foure beastes, which cried night and day, saying Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, which was, and which is, and which is to come. Which title repeated threentimes, among other things teacheth vs, that Christ God & man is soueraignely, and infinitely iust, good, mercifull, wise, puissant and true. Yea and so excellently and perfectly, that in his diuine and such like properties he is most holy, by no means participating therein with his creatures. For if there be any goodnes, righteousness, wisdom, or truth in man, he hath it not of himselfe but from God. And yet he hath but certaine drops, and sparkes thereof, which are accidentall, and v unexpected graces or qualities, (as they say in schooles) in such maner, that without them, he ceaseth not still to be a man. But Iesus Christ hath all those properties of himselfe: in him they are perfect and infinite, and they are his proper essence: in such sort, that to deny his righteousness, wisdom, power, mercy, and goodnes, it is to deny God. So by good right Christ is called Holy, holy, holy, and therefore it is no maruell, if this, and that which proceedeth thereof, surpasseth mans vnderstanding. For it exceedeth the capacity of Angels. As Esay sheweth by his vision, saying: That the Seraphins covered their faces with their two wings, as being not able to behold the splendure of his holinesse. Now the more it is incomprehensible, so much the more it admonisheth vs of our dutie, to humble and subiect our selues, vnder the obedience of his commandements, by amendment of our liues. For it is written, Bee yee holy as I am holy, and as hee which hath called you is holy, be you also holy in all your conuersation. And againe, We are elected by the providence of God, in sanctification of the Spirit, to obedience, and to be sprinkled with the blood of Iesus Christ.

4. The third cause to mooue vs to amendment of life, is the title of Emanuel given to Iesus Christ.

20. 7.
1. Cor. 6. 14.
Ier. 22. 23.
Psal. 33. 13.
Heb. 4. 13.

Christ holy, and most holy, is also called Emanuel, which is as much to say, as God with vs, by which title is signified and expressed, the manner and meanes whereby God communicateth himselfe vnto vs, not onely receiuing vs into grace, but also ioyning himselfe vnto vs in Iesus Christ, by that meanes making vs one with him, as Christ also prayed vnto his Father. Therefore this name of Emanuel, admonisheth vs of two things which ought to mooue vs to amendement of our liues. First, as there is nothing more contrary to the holines of Iesus Christ, then impietie, vnrightheousnes, malice, iniquity, auarice, ambition, lechery, and other such vices and corruptions: So there is nothing that should more forcibly stirre vs vp, and correct in vs, our vncleannes, and so reforme all the impiety of our actions, and manner of liuing, then the remembrance of the name of Emanuel; that is to say, God with vs, who by his secret vertue, being conioined and vnited vnto vs, so often crieth out in the holy Scriptures by his word, and in our soules by his spirit, Be ye holy; for I am holy: which is, as if he should daily make himselfe to be heard in our consciences, saying, that we cannot pronounce this title or name of Emanuel, vnlesse we separate our selues from all filthines and corruptions, because they cannot bee ioined with the holinesse of the Lord. Therefore Saint Paul earnestly exhorteth vs, to this durie of puritie, and all the doctrine of the Gospell tendeth to that ende, that we may both say, and retaine God with vs. For the second point, the same name of Christ teacheth vs, that wee haue God in euery place with vs, and consequently, that hee seeth all our thoughts, wils, words, and actions, as all things are naked, bare, and open vnto his eies: for the Deity is all in all, That is, all with vs, in vs, and neere vnto vs. Our darkenes and obscurity, are light to him, all is cleare and present before his face, as well past, as future things. Then let vs earnestly thinke vpon, and detest the ordinary manner of the life of the wicked, which dare presume to thinke, say, and doe thole things in the sight of the eternall God, which they would bee ashamed of before men.

5. The fourth cause or reason to mooue vs to amendment of life, is meditating vpon the fine other names and titles attributed to Christ.

Esay 9. 5.

The titles of Admirable, Counsellor, the mighty God, the Everlasting Father, and the Prince of peace, are attributed to Iesus Christ, by Esay, which ought to induce vs to amend our liues, by louing God, fearing to offend him, and by taking pleasure to yeeld obedience vnto him. For whereas the Lord is called Admirable, it is to assure vs, that in his wisdom, power, and goodnes, he surmounteth and surpasseth all whatsoeuer man can comprehend, or conceiue of the wisdom, force, blessings, and benefits of God, wherewith it pleaseth him to endowe his elect. The title of Counsellor, sheweth that Christ is filled with all vnderstanding, & knowledge, to giue vs true & faithfull counsell, in all our necessities and tribulations specially in that, which concerneth that holy seruice, which is agreeable & pleasing to the Lord, and the hope of our saluation. He is called the mighty God, to make vs certain and assured, that his force and greatnes is infinite, to execute and accomplish al whatsoeuer he wil, whether it be in defending, and saving vs from the ambushes and forces of our enemies; in punishing those that resist against him; or in communicating his gifts & graces vnto those that obey him as his children and seruants. He is called Prince, because he is the author and fountaine of all prosperity and felicity, both present and to come, properly signified by the name of peace. Lastly, he is called Everlasting Father, thereby to teach vs, That Iesus Christ is the beginning and the foundation of the Church, continuing it for euer, preserving it on earth, by continuall protection, and conducting it vnto heauen, to giue it eternall ioy and permanent glory in the everlasting world.

6. The fift reason to mooue vs to amendment of life, is two other names of our Saviour, Iesus and Christ.

Matth. 1. 21.

The Angel of God sent to Ioseph, when the holy Virgin was conceived, told him, that she should beare a Son, & he should be called Iesus, adding thereunto for a reason of that name, that

That he should save his people from their sinnes. And to the same end it was said vnto the Shepherds, This day is borne vnto you a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. Now as it is, the same Iesus which commandeth vs to amend our liues; so the consideration of those two names, ought specially to moue vs to yeeld that obedience vnto him. For first, the name of Iesus, which is a Saviour, admonisheth vs, that By nature wee are condemned, and that there is no saluation for vs, but in Christ onely. As Saint Peter also saith, For which cause, wee are bounde to acknowledge that wee are not our owne, but his that saved vs from eternall damnation: And consequently, That wee must renounce and forsake all our owne righteousnessse, not to liue to our selues, nor according to our owne wisdom, and willes, but according to the good will and pleasure of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ. That so forsaking our naturall corruptions, and living in Christ, being regenerated and renewed by his holy Spirit, wee may amend our liues. Touching the Title of Christ, (a Greeke name) in the Hebrewe tongue, it signifieth, the name of Messias, which is as much as if wee should say, Anointed, by which vnction is vnderstood the fulnesse of the holy Ghost, which the Lord receiued. As Saint Luke noteth, Who was filled therewith, That we (as Saint Iohn saith) might be participants of his fulnesse. And that the vnction which hee hath given vs, by the same spirit, may dwell in vs, and we in him. Saint Paul calling vs, The Temple of God, (addeth for a reason) because the holy Ghost dwelleth in vs. And the name of Christ also, drawne from Christ, and proper to his Disciples, confirmeth the same: For (saith the Apostle) those that haue not the spirit of Christ, are not in him. And as wee cannot say, that in such a place there is a true and a naturall fire, if heate and light proceede not from it, so the holy Ghost cannot be in vs, if we neither feele nor shew forth the effects that belong to the holines thereof. Therefore this name of Christ, teaching vs that we are participants of the vnction of his spirit, ought to be a notable and strong reason to inforce vs to amend our liues. Which if we doe not, it is in vaine for vs to say we are Christians, or to vaunt and boast, that Christ is our Saviour, and that his spirit dwelleth in vs.

1 Iohn 2. 27.

7. The sixth reason to moue vs to amend our liues, is that wee are strangers and pilgrims in this life.

The holy Scripture oftentimes calleth vs strangers, pilgrims, and travellers, (not as Abraham, speaking to the Canaanites) said, I am a stranger and a forreiner among you: nor as it may happen to diuers men, which leaue their native Countries to dwell in other places, but specially in regard of the kingdome of heauen, our true and eternall countrey. And if we be citizens of heauen, (as S. Paul teacheth vs) we are strangers heere on earth. Now our spiritual birth proceedeth from our heavenly Father, and we receiue the seale thereof in the Church, which is the kingdom of God. His dwelling is in heauen, where our eldest brother Iesus Christ is, and all our brethren and sisters also in him. Our immortall riches, and inheritance not contaminated nor corruptible, are kept & preferred in the land of the liuing, that are happy for euer. Then our countrey is there, and in regard thereof we are rightly called strangers, pilgrims, and travellers in this mortall and transitory world: which ought to incourage & moue vs fro hence to lift vp our thoughts, minds, & vnderstandings to our celestial habitation, that so beholding God with the eies of faith, and the glory of Christ, together with the excellency of our inheritance, we may all the daies of our liues reioice with the Angels, and the soules of the Saints, already ascended vp into heauen, and with them by a holy & spirituall communion, continually without ceasing praise the Lord. As S. Paul saith, That we which beleue in Iesus Christ, are come to mount Sion, to the City of the liuing God, the Celestial Ierusalem, and to the company of innumerable Angels, and to the assembly of the first borne, which are written in heauen, And to God the iudge of all, and to the Spirits of iust and perfect men, and to Iesus the Mediator of the new Testament. Wherefore, hauing ascended so high, and hauing our conuersation in heauen, as Citizens of the heavenly kingdome: wee must no more looke downe vpon the earth, to make any account thereof, much lesse of the vanities (which the fooles of the world) therein admire, and looke after; But rather continually meditate and remember, that here we are but strangers, pilgrims, and travellers, that so we may be perswaded to amend our liues, renouncing and forsaking the world, and the flesh, and preparing our selues by faith, hope, and good workes, to goe to take possession of our celestial inheritance, at the time ordeyned and appointed by God.

Matth. 4. 17. Lastly, and for the seventh reason to perswade vs, to amend our liues; the reason is added by Iesus Christ himselfe, to his first exhortation, that is, For the kingdome of heauen, or of God, is at hand. To vnderstand it better, wee must note three significations of this kingdome. First, by the same is meant, the happy state and incomprehensible felicitie which we shall enioy after the resurrection: as when the Lord said, Many shall come from the East, and from the West, and sit downe with Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, in the Kingdome of heauen. In which manner of speaking, there is an allusion to a table in a banquet, as if Christ said, They shall enioy eternall life, with the holy Patriarches. Secondly, the Kingdome of heauen signifieth, the regenerated man, which consisteth in a true knowledge of God, by faith and mortification of the old man Adam, and newnes of life: as when Christ saith, The kingdome of God is in you, And the Apostle, The kingdome of God is not meat nor drinke, but righte-ousnesse, and peace, and ioy in the holy Ghost. Thirdly, the Kingdome of heauen oftentimes signifieth, the holy Ministerie, and preaching of the Gospell: as when Saint Paul speaking of certaine faithfull seruants of God, saith, These onely are my workesfellowes vnto the Kingdome of heauen. As the Lord said, That he that is the least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater then Iohn Baptist. Whereunto also we may adde, that which he teacheth in the Similitude or Parable of the same kingdome, as the seede cast into diuers kindes of grounds, to signifie, (that the holy Ministerie doth not produce fruit in all those that heare the Word.) To a Treasure hid in the field, and to a Merchant that seeketh for good pearles, to shew how much wee ought to esteeme of the preaching of the Word of GOD. All these significati- ons ought to moue vs, to amend our liues. For first, when by the kingdome of hea- uen is meant, the happie state, and the vnspeakeable and eternall beatitude which wee hope for and expect in the world to come, it aduertiseth vs, that our condition is farre different from that of the brute beastes, which when they die, consume to nothing: But when men die, all is not dead with them, for those which beleue in Iesus Christ, shall bee better, and enioy a life full of glory, peace, ioy, and in- comprehensible felicitie without end. And to the contrarie, they that shall be hardened in their incredulitie, and in wickednesse, shall bee tormented in the fire of the wrath of God eternally. As Daniel saith, That many of them that sleepe in the dust of the earth, shall awake, some to euertasting life, and some to shame and perpetuall contempt. As the Lord also con- firmeth the same in the Gospell.

Then to vnderstand the true meaning of this reason, For the kingdome of heauen is at hand: we must vndoubtedly beleue (as it is an article of our faith) that Christ shal come to iudge the quick and the dead, some to eternall life, in all happines with God: and the blessed spi- rits, others to eternal death and condemnation with the diuel and his angels. It is the foun- dation or ground of the Apostles argument to exhort men to repent and amend their liues, saying, and the time of this ignorance God regarded not, but now he admonisheth all men euery where to repent, because he hath ordained a day in the which he wil iudge the world in righteousness, by that man whom he hath appointed, wherof he hath given an assurance to all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead. How in righteousness? because (as hee saith in another place) we must also appeare before the iudgement seat of Christ, that every man may receiue the things that are done in his body, according to that he hath done whe- ther it be good or euill, And that God will reward euery man according to his workes, that is to them which through patience in well doing seeke glory and honor, and immortality, life euertasting, but to them that are contentious and discobey the truth, and obey vnrighteousnes, shal be indignation and wrath. Secondly, when by the kingdome of heauen hee vnderstandeth the state, wherein the children of God are established in this life, by faith in Iesus Christ, it ought to inflame our hearts, with a right & true desire of amendment of life. This kingdome (saith S. Paul) consisteth in righteousness, peace & ioy in the H. Ghost. By righteousness he vnderstands the singular benefit which we obtaine by this, that Christ by his death hauing satisfied & appeased the wrath of God for our sins, & so paid al our debts, he hath given & imputed vnto vs his perfect obedience, that so we might be iustified before the iudgment seat of God, a benefit which is the most assured foundation of our saluation, & ther- fore fore incomprehensible in regard of the greatnes and excellency thereof. By peace, the Apostle vnderstandeth that peace which is with God, and in our consciences, whereof hee had said before, that being iustified by faith, we haue peace towards God, through our Lord Iesus Christ. And by the ioy which he saith of the holy Ghost, he vnderstandeth that full and perfect ioy which the Lord hath promised vs, and which shal neuer be taken away from vs. So the remembrance of the kingdome, which Christ saith is within vs, and which consisteth in righteousness, peace, and ioy, ought to moue and make vs to abhorre all sinne and iniquity. If we will not change this righteousness into damnable vnrighteousnes, peace into war and trouble of conscience, and ioy into weeping & gnashing of teeth. Thirdly whereas the kingdome of heaven signifieth the holy ministry, it teacheth vs diuers notable reasons, which bind vs to amend our liues. As in this, where our Lord sayd, speaking to his Apostles, and in them to all faithfull Pastors and Ministers of the word. He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth mee, & he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me. And S. Paul witnesseth to the Thessalonians, that they had received the word which he preached vnto them, not as the word of men, but (as it is indeed) the word of God. And as Iesus Christ saith, that whosoever shall not receiue you, nor heare you, when you depart thence, Shake of the dust that is vnder your feet, for a witnes vnto them, Verily I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Sodom and Gomorrha at the day of iudgement then for them. Now if we thinke vpon the fire that fell from heauen, which burnt and consumed those townes, and others were adioyning vnto them, with all the men and women both young and old, and also their cattle, and after that turned the place where those townes stood into a stinking and an infectious lake or poole, eight dutch mile in greatnes, (as many men note) with other testimonies of the wrath of God rehearsed in the Scriptures, what is he, that is able to refraine from quaking for feare, if in his conscience he knowes that hee hath despised God, speaking vnto him, by the mouth of his seruants, and faithfull Ministers.

Again, In this holy ministrie wee haue another reason to moue vs to amendment of life, in this, That Christ hauing breathed vpon his Disciples gave them the holy Ghost, with power both to them, and all faithfull Pastors, by the preaching of his word, to retaine the sinnes of the incredulous, and to remitte the sinnes of the faithfull, who conuerting, truly confesse and beleue him to be the Sonne of God. And as the administration of the Sacraments is a part of this ministrie, so they ought to moue and persuade vs to amendment of life. Holy baptism is the seale of the aliance made by God, specially comprehending two graces; that is, remission of sinnes, and our regeneration or spirituall renewing. For charity and the Spirit of Christ, being as it were the soule of the new man reformed to the Image of God, in that sacred washing: from thence forward hee ought not to haue any motion in thought, word, or worke; but that which proceedeth from the same spirit dwelling in him; according to the measure of Grace that is giuen him from above. And the holy Sacrament of the Eucharistie, is the nourishment of our soules, to a spirituall and eternall life, by the communion of the body and bloud of our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ: For from thence there ought to follow and proceed a life compleate with thoughts, affections, words, and works, like vnto that sacred food, that is holy, and spirituall, putting vs in mind, that as the celebration of that most diuine misterie, is the Table of the children of God, and the members of the Church of Christ. So the participation thereof, is a manner of solemne protestation made by vs, that we are of the number of his children, and members of the holy Church, and that wee separate our selues from prophane and vicious people, to liue holily, righteously, and religiously.

Further also, publike Praiers are apart of the holy ministrie, and euery faithfull Christian ought to accompany the mouth of the Minister (with their vnderstandings, willes, and hearts) when hee pronounceth them: as if all the Church spake to God by him. The summe and effect of that which we demand and craue of God in those praiers, is, that the Lord by his spirit would worke in vs, that which he requireth to be done by vs, that wee may obey & please him; and consequently that he wil giue vs the grace to repent & amend our liues. In such manner that this request made to God, sufficiently admonisheth vs of our duties in that point. Lastly, there is the excercise of Ecclesiasticall discipline, which is a dependance of the holy ministrie, the principall intent whereof is, that euery member of the Church, should walke in the feare of God, and that if hee turneth backe to stray from it, he should be brought into the way of Saluation by amendment of life.

Thus you see how the Ministry signified by the kingdome of heaven, and considered in all his principall parts, ought to moue vs with great affection to amend our liues. Againe, we are to marke an other notable thing in this, that by the kingdome of heaven, or of God, is signified the felicitie of his children in heaven, and his kingdome in them, and also the holy Ministerie of the Gospell, or of the Church. For this title of the kingdome of heaven, common to those three different estates, sufficiently sheweth, that notwithstanding there is betweene them a great band of coniunction and vnitie, and such, that when wee are in this world of the kingdome of God, that is, in the Church, and vsing the holy Ministerie, wee are in the infallible way to heaven. Likewise, if the kingdome of God bee in vs, by his Spirit of Regeneration, wee are certaine to enter into the celestially kingdome that is aboue. In such manner, that heere on earth wee haue as it were two degrees or steppes to mount vpon it, and two gates which wee must passe through, to goe into it. For whosoever desireth to bee assured in his conscience, whether hee bee one of the number of the children of God, and heires of the kingdome of glorie, hee ought to seeke for the knowledge and certaintie thereof in himselfe, because that if hee bee a member of the Church, enioying the holy Ministry, men may well hold and account him to bee the childe of God belonging to his kingdome. And if hee hath attained to the second degree, feeling the kingdome of heaven in his heart, let him bee assured, that God holdeth him for one of his elect, and that he shall enter into his inheritance of eternall glorie. Now if there bee nothing more happy, then to enioy the kingdome of God in heaven, by the like reason there is nothing to be more desired, then to enter both into the first, and second gate of that kingdome.

Math. 6. 33.

This therefore is a most liuely reason, to induce vs to practise that which Iesus Christ commaundeth vs, That first wee should seeke the kingdome of God, and the righteousnesse thereof, and consequently, that wee should repent and amend our liues. For if the apprehension of the kingdome of glory which is in heaven, ought to raiue vs with an ardent zeale and desire to attaine thereunto, and if wee cannot obtaine it, vnlesse the kingdome of God be in vs, that is, if wee haue not that faith which bringeth forth good works, and amendment of life. And also if the kingdome of heaven cannot bee in vs, vnlesse wee bee members of the Church, which is the holy ministerie of Christ. It followeth, that there is nothing which wee ought more earnestly to desire, nor carefullier to seeke for, then the kingdome of heaven, that is, to bee participant in the Church of the holy Ministerie, and by the exercise and vse thereof, to establish the kingdome of God in vs, thereby at the last to enter into the possession of the eternall kingdome of God with the blessed. Now wee must consider of the last part of the sentence pronounced by Christ, saying, That the kingdome of heaven is at hand: which may bee referred to the three degrees whereof wee haue spoken, that is, to the kingdome of glory, which wee hope for in heaven, to the renewing and restoring of man, and to the preaching of the Gospell. And so the kingdome of heaven being considered in these three points, did truly approach and draw neere to man, at the coming of our Lord Iesus Christ.

Gen. 3. 24.

Touching the first, we know that Adam and Eve by their transgression were driven out of the garden of Eden, or Paradise, and that God placed and set Cherubins on the east side of the garden, with a flaming sword, which turned euery way, to keepe the way of the tree of life. Now God hauing thereby shewed, that man was driven out and banished from heaven, and from life eternall: at the building of the Tabernacle, and after that of the Temple in Ierusalem, gaue vnto the people of Israel, a certen figure of the entrie into heaven, by the Messias to come. Who being come, and by his death hauing opened the way to heaven, and by his resurrection, when he mounted vpon into heaven God and man, the kingdome of heaven did also thereby draw neere vnto vs.

Heb. 2. 14.
Rom. 6. 6.

Secondly, when by the misterie of our redemption, he destroyed and overcame him that had the power of death, that is the Diuell, and crucified our old man, to raise vs vpon to newnes of life, thereby destroying the kingdome of Sathan, hee brought the kingdome of heaven neere vnto vs. For it was not so neere to our fathers the Patriarches, and other faithful Iewes. They had the promise made to Adam, that the seed of the woman should bruiſe the serpents heade, but the accomplishing thereof was seene in Iesus Christ, when by his death he destroyed the Diuell and the power of hell. As the Israelites also had the law and the sacrifices for workes of righteousnes, and assured gages of life and saluation. But the Gospel

Gospell and grace was brought vnto vs by Christ: by accomplishing of all righteousness, that so we might be made new creatures, to worship God in spirit and in truth, and by taking good heed to the things that had bene sayde vnto vs, that wee should not fall from it.

Thirdly, we haue the preaching of the word of saluation, which drew neere to vs cleerely and effectually, at the coming of our redeemer. For by the holy ministerie of the Gospell, cleare and certaine knowledge was giuen to the Church, of the person of Iesus Christ, how he was conceived by the holy Ghost, and borne of the Virgin Mary, & therefore very God, and very man. As also of his offices, hauing in all fullnes receiued spirituall unction to be our high Priest, King & Prophet. Consequently of his passion, death, resurrection and ascension into heauen, and so of the certainty of our iustification and saluation by the meere grace of God. Let vs adde, that the kingdome of heauen is neere vnto vs, and euery day approacheth neerer vnto vs, in a twofold manner. First, for that euery day, the separation which is to be made of our soules from our bodies, that they may ascend vp to heauen with Iesus Christ, draweth neerer.

Iohn. 4. 12.
Heb. 2. 1.

Secondly, because we daily attend and expect the day of the Lord: when hee shall come to Iudge the quicke and the dead. Which should so much the more moue vs to a true amendment of our liues, knowing well that no vncleane thing, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or lies, shall enter into the supercelestiall Citie, and that wee must alwaies be ready and prepared, because the Sonne of man will come at an houre when we thinke not on it. And if the remembrance and representation of the Kingdome of heauen, so neere vnto vs, doth not ardently moue our hearts, to attaine thereunto, and by desiring it, to amend our liues, to walke in the way that leadeth vs to that felicitie, it is a certaine testimony, that wee esteeme ourselues to bee simple brute beasts, hauing no hope of happinesse after death. As also on the other side, If the apprehension of the fire which neuer shall be quenched, of wormes which gnaw continually, of fearefull perpetuall darkenesse, of weeping and gnashing of teeth without ende, by the feeling of the terrible wrath of the liuing God, doth not moue our hearts with feare to offend him, and by offending him, that hee will cast vs headlong into the gulfe and bottomlesse pit of eternall condemnation, it is an euident signe that we are Atheists or Saduceans, neither beleeuing the resurrection of the body, the immortalitie of the soule, heauen, nor hell.

Math. 24. 44.

9. Conclusion of this Chapter.

For conclusion of so many causes and reasons, for the which euery Christian, which is the childe of God, ought carefully to embrace the meanes which his word teacheth vs to amend our liues and so to make them most happy: Let vs remember that wee are borne, and purchased seruants to our Lord Iesus Christ: Borne, because he is our Creator, purchased, because hee hath redeemed vs, to bee more particularly vnto him. Therefore it should bee a double Sacriledge and profanation of that, which for two speciall reasons ought to be dedicated and consecrated to his seruice: If we obey not the commandement which he giueth vs with a double authority, to turne vnto him by true repentance. That the names and titles giuen to this Sauour of the world, as Holy, Emanuel, Admirable, Counsellor, most puissant God, Prince of peace, Eternall Father, Iesus and Christ, ought to be as many goades vnto vs to pricke vs forward vnto that amendment which hee requireth at our hands, as also that in this life we are strangers, pilgrims, and travellers. And specially the reason which the Lord addeth to his exhortation, That the kingdome of heauen is at hand. And that it belongeth vnto vs, in time to prepare our selues, that is presently in a manner to bee in his kingdome, while wee liue here on earth, that wee may bee ready to enter into heauen, there to take full possession of the eternall glorie, which is certaine and assured to all those, who beeing ledde by the holy Ghost, forsake and renounce all the workes of the flesh, to liue according to the fruites of the same Spirit. Let vs remember the counsell of Christ, That if the master of the house knewe at what watch of the night the thiefe would come, hee would watch to keepe his house from being broken: Adding, That happy shall that seruant bee, whom the Master shall finde busie when hee cometh. That is it which our Sauour sheweth vs by a similitude of tenne Virgins, whereof five were wise, and five foolish, and that because the foolish had no oyle in their lampes, they were shut out of the bride chamber, and the wife went in. This day of the Lord approacheth, to accomplish his kingdome, and the mysticall Banket of him and his Spouse the Church. Therefore let vs get good store of holy oyle, and let vs put on our wedding garments, lest the Master of the Feast should cast vs out into vtter darknes; but rather finding vs to be clothed with a true knowledge of God, and of faith, charitie, holinesse, and all other good works, he may lead vs into the place of glory, there to liue happily for euer.

THE SECOND PART OF CHRISTIAN PHYLOSOPHIE.

Of the true and onely meanes to attaine to a happie life.

That man being a true Christian Phylosopher, ought to exercise and comfort himselfe in seuen principall things: whereof the first is meditation of the life to come, and to bee well assured of eternall and celestially felicitie, premised to the children of God. Chap. I.

1. Humane life is to bee esteemed of by the faithfull, although it bee full of miseries, and that a man may comfort himselfe therein, by seuen singular and speciall things.

Plinie: Hiracletus.
Timon.
The Scythians,

Those Philosophers which iudged, that our soueraigne good here on earth is neuer to be borne, and that the next great benefite after that, is to die quickly, and following that opinion. The Scythians vsed to weepe, when their children were borne, and to the contrary reioyced when any of their friends and parents died, and making a great and solemne feast, were of opinion that they did well, as they thought in their humane sence and vnderstanding: Although they profited nothing thereby. For seeing they were infidels, voide of the light and knowledge of God, and of true religion, they could see nothing but pouerty, misery and horror in terrestriall life. And because they wanted the true doctrine of faith, they did not see, how that which is neither happy, nor of it selfe to be desired, turneth into saluation to the faithfull. And therefore the ende of their iudgement was despaire. But wee, being the children and seruants of God, instructed by his word, although wee know well, that this life is full of misery; neuerthelesse, by good right wee hold it to be one of the blessings of God, which are to bee esteemed of, specially herein, that to the faithfull it is a testimonie of the goodnesse of God towards them, beeing wholly ordained to bee a meanes of their saluation: For thereby it pleaseth him, before the full reuelation vnto vs of the inheritance of immortall glory, in things of lesse moment, to declare himselfe to bee our Father, that is, in the blessings and benefits which wee daily receiue at his hands: In such manner, that here we begin to taste the sweetnesse of his benignitie, in this, that hee preserueth vs in this world, and giueth vs all things necessarie to maintaine our liues; that so our hope and desire may be incited to expect the full reuelation of his loue towards vs, by the which hee hath called vs, to be heires of his kingdome. Therefore this should be our intent and speciall purpose, touching this transitorie & mortall life, that beholding the calamities and miseries wherewith it is replenished, we should bee fully resolved, and better prepared, to exercise and comfort our selues in seuen principall things. Which are, Meditation of the life to come: knowledge of the meanes which assure vs to be the children of God: to know how how to apply the markes of this adoption vnto our selues: To haue a full confidence thereof, though it be but weake in vs, to confirme and assure our selues therein: To make vse of afflictions, constantly to perseuere to the end in our vocation: and to proceede and goe on in our course of life, here on earth in holy prayers.

2. Meditation of life eternall, is the first comfort of a Christian, the felicitie whereof is incomprehensible.

That we may begin the second part of our Christian Phylosophie, with the first of the seven singular things aforesaid, (which is the meditation of the life to come) let vs heare what Esay saith, who presenting a most earnest prayer vnto God for the Church, setteth downe the benefits which she had receiued by the goodnesse of God in her deliuerances, saying, When thou didst terrible things, which we looked not for, thou camest down, and the mountanes melted at thy presence: for since the beginning of the world, they haue not heard, nor understood with the eare, neither hath the eye seene another God beside thee, which doeth so to him that waiteth for him. And the Apostle Saint Paul, expounding these wordes to bee spoken of terrestriall blessings, makes them agree with that proposition which hee made to the Corinthians of spirituall doctrine, and the promises of life eternall, reuealed vnto him by the holy Ghost, saying, The things which eye hath not seene, neither eare hath heard, neither came into mans heart, are those which God hath prepared for them that loue him. This argument wee must draw from the Minor to the Maior, thus: That if mans capacitie cannot reach to the measure of the terrestriall benefits, which God bestoweth vpon his children and seruants here on earth; much lesse can mans humane vnderstanding attaine to that height, to bee able to comprehend the wisdom of the eternall God; touching the institution of Christianitie, and the felicitie of the life to come, which is reserved in heaven for the faithfull.

And to that end Saint Augustine aduertiseth vs, in the meditation of future beatitude, to passe and mount vp beyond all that whatsoever may bee vnderstood and apprehended by vs, and not to stay at the profunditie and excellencie of that which wee imagine, but to say to our selues: Yet this is not it; for if it were the same, it would not enter into our hearts and thoughts. As in another place also this great Doctour confesseth, That hee knew not what the state and the rest of the blessed shall be, that he had not learned it by his corporal senses, and that if hee should say that hee had seene it, by the spirit and vnderstanding, all that is too little in man to conceiue it, in regard of the greatnesse and excellencie of the sight of God, which is promised vnto vs in eternall life, with that peace, which the Apostle saith, passeth all mans vnderstanding. Therefore, if there bee any good, beautie, sweetnes, glorie, delight, ioy, and pleasure; if there bee any thing desirabile, profitable, compleat and perfect, which mans vnderstanding may comprehend, his heart thinke, or his will desire, whereby to enioy an entire and certaine contentment. To bee short, if there bee any subject appertaining to soueraigne good, and true beatitude; our great and most good God, will bee all that in his elect, at the day of the Lord in the resurrection. For (as S. Iohn saith) Then there shall bee a new heaven, and a new earth; for the celestially Ierusalem, wherof the most puissant God shall bee the Temple, and the Lambe Iesus Christ the eternall Sonne: and his seruants shall serue him, and see his face, and his name shall bee in their foreheads, to reigne with him in perpetuall and inuolable light for ever and ever. Then this felicitie of our soules glorified, and of our bodies made incorruptible and spiritual, as that glorious body of Christ, to be there where he is, in soueraigne blisse and beatitude, cannot bee comprehended by vs, touching the greatnesse and perfection thereof, while wee liue here in our terrestriall and corruptible bodies, where wee know God but in part, and obscurely. Therefore wee must enter into that house prepared for vs by the eternall God, where hee will fully replenish vs with his light, to know his glory, shewing himselfe vnto vs, and such as in himselfe hee is.

3. The greatnesse and perpetuities of the goodnesse, which is to bee expected in life eternall.

Neuertheles, seeing that S. Paul addeth to the text aforesaid, that God by his spirit, which searcheth all things, hath reuealed vnto vs those things that were not seene, nor heard, nor euer entred into the heart of man: and that in another place hee prayeth to the Lord, to illuminate illuminate the eyes of the vnderstanding of the faithfull Ephesians, that they might knowe what the hope is of their calling, and what the riches of his glorious inheritance is in the Saints. We should be too much vnthankfull towards God, yea enemies of our owne good and comfort, if we should not take paines, or should refuse to vnderstand & to know, that which it pleaseth him to declare vnto vs in his word touching such secrets. For let vs not thinke, elsewhere to finde any thing which draweth neerer to the satisfaction or contentment of that meditation. Then let vs first note, that the felicity of Christians is oftentimes signified vnto vs, in the holy Scriptures, by the promise of life eternall, and that with great reason. For in our blessednes two points specially may, and ought to be considered: That is, the greatnes and excellency of the good which we shall receiue, and the long continuance and firmenes thereof, which are both noted by these two words, Life eternall. The one shewing the infinit & immouable continuance of celestial felicity, the other the heighth and perfection of the same, for God is life, and hath it in himselfe, which was from the beginning in Christ, to the which end, the Scripture often speaketh: saying, The eternall lieth, or the Lord lieth: who by his great power incessantly distilleth into the masse of humane flesh the same breath of life, which he breathed in the face of our first father Adam, when he was made a liuing soule. Againe, he giueth to his elect the grace to bee new borne or regenerated, that is of water and of the spirit, that beleeuing in the name of Iesus Christ, they may haue life eternall. As it is written, That the first man Adam was made a liuing soule, and that as in Adam all died, so in Christ all shall be made alieue. Blessed be God saith Saint Peter, who according to his abundant grace hath begotten vs againe vnto a liuely hope, by the resurrection of Iesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance immortall, and vndefiled, and that withereth not, reserved in heauen for vs: wherein yee reioyce with ioy vnspeakeable, and glorious, receiuing the end of your faith, even the saluation of your soules. And in truth, it is the glory of God, which ought to be the end and purpose of all our desires. But as of his great mercy, hee hath made his glory appeare vnto vs, so it hath pleased him, that the thing whereunto we aspire, and the reward promised to his Church, should bee life eternall.

Eph. 8, 11,

4. Three principall degrees of blessed and eternall life.

Vpon this generall doctrine of the felicities of Christians aforesaid, we are specially to consider, three principal degrees of a blessed, happy, & eternal life, which wholly concerne man, (Body and Soule.) The first, touching the soule, consisteth in the reconciliation of man with God, by faith in Iesus Christ, who being our Emanuel, is the cause that God is with vs: For as we consider two kindes of life, the one corporal, which consisteth in the conjunction of the body and the soule; the other spirituall, which consisteth in the vnion of man with God. So beeing reconciled, and vnited with our Creatour, by Christ, we are established in the life of the soule, from which the sinne of Adam, (wherein we are borne) made vs decline and fall.

Eph. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5.

And therefore Saint Paul saith, that at such time as wee were dead in trespasses and sinnes, and by nature children of wrath, God, which is rich in mercy, quickened vs together in Christ, by whose grace wee are saued. If we be of the number of those whom it is written, The hower shall come, and now is, that the dead shall heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and they that heare it shall liue.

Col. 2. 13.
Ioh. 5. 25.
Rom. 5. 1.
14. 17.

From thence wee haue that peace towards God, through our Lord Iesus Christ, wherof the Apostle speaketh, and which all true faithfull Christians feele; for that the assurance of their reconciliation in Christ, is a benefit which raviseth their soules with vnspeakeable ioy, in this that they know themselves, by grace to bee drawn from the darkenesse of this world, to the light of the kingdome of heauen, and from the paths of death, to the way of life. In regard of the body, by this first degree of life, they feele the fruits thereof in miseries and afflictions, in which their naturall condition holdeth them while they liue in this world. For they are not onely mitigated and made light vnto them, by the interior feeling of the spirituall graces aforesaid, but the faithfull also therby find matter to reioyce in their corporall afflictions, because they are vnto them, as many testimonies of the goodnesse of God towards them, wherof they receiue the benefit and blessing to come, in celestial glory. To this wee must apply that which Saint Paul saith: That all things worke together for the best, unto them that loue God, predestinated to bee made conformable to the image of his Sonne, and whose bodies are wholly mortified by Iesus Christ, that of corruptible bodies, they may rise incorruptible, spiritual and glorious bodies to reigne with Christ, as they suffered with him. 1. Cor. 4

Rom. 8. 27. 28

The second degree of a happie and eternall life, is to bee considered in the separation of the soule and the bodie, which improperly is called Death, in respect of the faithfull: for although their bodies lie and rot in the earth, neuertheless, being then deliuered and freed from all corporall diseases, as hunger, thirst, colde, heate, and a thousand other torments, which naturally are as many kindes of death, to the frailtie of the flesh, they goe to rest in their beds (as Esay saith,) and resting from their labours and trauels, are made blessed (saith Saint Iohn.) And seeing Christ himselfe witnesseth, that the body sleepeth when the soule leaueth it; it followeth, that it is not dead, but liuing, and as if bee should resemble a man, who being diseased, falleth asleepe, and so feeleth no paine. Againe, the resting of the body in the graue, is according to the will of God, who hath ordained that men shall once die in that manner, to whose glory all the faithfull liue and die, and before him their death is precious. From thence wee conclude, that such rest cannot properly bee called death, but rather a kinde of better life: for then the soule entred into the possession of the second degree of life; for being separated from the body, it is carried by the Angels into Abrabams bosome, in Paradise, with Iesus Christ, exempted from ignorance, incredulitie, distrust, concupiscence, ambition, enuie, feare, and whereby it is besieged and assaulted, all the time that it dwelleth in her terrestriall habitation: And to the contrary, by changing of her dwelling, is fully sanctified, victorious, and assured against the deuill, the world, the flesh, and hell: her capitall enemies, by the most streight coniunction and vnion which shee hath with her Creator, attending the accomplishing of her glory at the day of the resurrection of all flesh.

Then the third degree of a happy and blessed life shall appeare, when our bodies being raised out of their sleepe, by the sound of the trumpet of the Angel of God, at the glorious coming of Iesus Christ, shall rise in incorruption, glory, and power, transformed and made conformable and like to the glorious body of our Lord Iesus Christ. For then our soules being reunit with our bodies, they shall together bee caught vp in the cloudes into the ayre, before the great Iudge of the liuing and the dead, and after lifted vp aboue the heauens into the celestiaall house of God their Father. And then the life of our soules shall bee accomplished, when wee shall bee wholly where Christ is, and with him, as members of his glorious body vnited vnto him, and by him to God, the fountaine of life, by that meanes enjoying the communion of all his goodnesse and benefits, and of the incorruptible inheritance that cannot bee defiled, nor withered, which is reserved in heauen for them that haue washed their garments, and made them white in the blood of the Lambe. To conclude, wee shall there bee like to the Angels, and our bodies shall shine like the Sunne. How much more then our Soules?

5. Singular and speciall considerations of Beatitude, and Life eternall.

But specially Saint Paul eleuateth our minde into a most high contemplation of the felicitie of life eternall, which we are to enjoy after the resurrection, when he saith, That then Iesus Christ shall deliuer up the kingdome to God the Father, that he may bee all in all: For thereby we learne, that we shall be wholly brought to God, as Christ is one with him, because all those whom the Father had given to the Sonne, before the foundation of the world, to be redeemed, (according to his eternall counsell and decree,) by the blood of Iesus Christ, and to be members of his Church, by the power of the holy Ghost, in the latter day shall be fully made happy and blessed for ever. For then Christ worke for the saluation of man shall be accomplished, and all his offices shall cease: in such manner neuertheless, that the fruits and spirituall benefits which the Church receiued thereby, shall for ever haue their full effect in the elect, because that God, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, one only God shall be all things in Iesus Christ, God and Man: and by him in vs, as his members, Christ being made King, Father, life, and eternall glory in vs. Then that which is written shall be accomplished, that every faithful seruant, shall enter into his masters ioy. Vpon which point Saint Augustine teacheth vs a most holy and a celestiaall meditation, who after he had shewed

how all goodnesse resideth and dwelleth in God, as beeing onely and meere good, and in whom all that which wee loue and desire is to bee found: the fruition whereof procurerh such ioy and delight, as cannot bee comprehended: hee goeth on in this manner, and saith: Oh poore humane heart, exercised in miserie, and in a manner ouerwhelmed therewith, what ioy wouldest thou haue, if thou haddest the full fruition of the aboundance of that soueraigne goodnesse, aske thy soule, whether thou shouldest bee capable of so great blessednesse? Againe, if any other man, whom thou shouldst loue as wel as thy selfe, should enioy the same, and the like felicitie with thee, would not the contentment of thine owne happinesse bee redoubled in respect of thy good friendes, and for his sake, and for his ioy, wouldest thou not bee as glad as for thine owne? And if two or three, or a great number of thy most louing and well affected friendes enioyed the same blessednesse with thee, it is certaine that thou wouldest feelee as much ioy and gladnesse in thy heart for them, as for thine owne.

Then what wouldest thou doe in that perfect Charitie, wherewith in heauen wee shall loue all the Angels, and all the elect that are fully made blessed? It is certaine, that if euery one of vs in particular shall not bee capable of his owne proper ioy, because it shall bee so great, what shall wee bee in regard of all the ioyes of the perfect beatitude of all the children of God? Thus much this good Father saith. But let vs think and meditate with our selues, how much this our delight shall bee encreased and augmented, to behold the glory of the Sonne of God, (in whom we were elected, iustified, and sanctified) in heauen, to enioy the same beatitude? When wee, I say, shall see him face to face, vnited in one person with the Deitie, and shining with an infinite brightnesse with the Father, and the holy Ghost, one onely God in Maiestie eternall.

And let vs further remember, that this perfect contemplation, which will make vs know God as hee is, will also make vs to loue him as hee is, that is, incomprehensible, and therefore infinite. For, if as wee loue a man, wee reioyce at his good, it will come to passe, that louing God which is in heauen, without comparison more then our selues, or then all the Angels, and the blessed soules together, wee shall infinitely feelee more ioy for the glory of God, then for our owne felicitie, and that of all the elect; for then wee shall loue him with all our hearts, with all our soules, and with all our strengths, in such manner, that wee shall not be capable of the perfection of this loue to the infinitie, nor consequently sufficient to comprehend the fulnesse of the ioy which shall bee in vs. Therefore let vs say, that seeing the compleate, yea and more then compleate felicitie which wee shall enioy in the life eternall, cannot bee comprehended by vs; it resteth, that being filled with our owne ioy, and with that Ocean of gladnesse which shall spread it selfe in our hearts, in regard of the blessednesse of the Angels, and of all the faithfull, we shal enter into, and be as it were swallowed vp in the gulfes of ioy, proceeding from this, that wee shall see God reigning as hee is, in Maiestie and glorie.

6. Diuers degrees of Blessednesse, which are without ende, and most assured to the faithfull.

There resteth yet three points more, which are of singular consolation, in this matter whereof we entreat. The first is, that although euery one of vs ought to vnderstand, that as diuers vessels cast into the Sea, are so full of water, that they can hold no more: so when the Sea of diuinitie shalbe powred into vs to life eternal, all and euery one of vs shal be filled in such maner with goodnes and glory, that we cannot wish for, or possesse more. Neuerthelesse, this is most true, that as God distributing his blessings in the world to his faithfull seruants, in diuers maner, maketh the beames of his graces shine more abundantly vpon some, then vpon others, vnequally, so in heauen, where he will crowne his owne gifts, the measure of the glory shall not be alike. For that which Saint Paul saith of himselfe to the Thessalonians, that they are his ioy, his hope; and his crowne of glory, in the presence of our Lord Iesus Christ, at the day of his comming doth not generally concerne all the elect: nor that likewise, that the Lord said to his Apostles, that they should sit vpon twelve thrones, and iudge the twelue tribes of Israel. But the Apostle knowing that God glorifieth his Saints in heauen, as in measure he hath enriched them hereon earth, with spirituall giftes, assured himselfe that he should receiue a speciall crowne according to his labors in the Lord, (as in another place, in proper tearmes he witnesseth.) And as Christ to set forth the Apostolicall

1 Cor. 3. 8.

Apostolicall dignitie, aduertised his disciples, That the fruites of their labours should attend them in heaven, and thereupon promiset them, and in them all the faithfull, a particular reward, and an hundred fold more, then they had lost, or left for his sake. Then let vs say, That as Iesus Christ by the varietie of the graces of his holy Spirit, which hee distributeth heere in this world, beginneth the glory of his mysticall body, in the elect of God his Father, and amplifieth it by degrees, so hee will perfect the same in heaven; but alwayes in such manner, that the degrees of glorie beeing distinguished, according to the diuers vocations of men, and as they shall haue trauelled and suffered in the worke of the Lord. As S. Augustine saith, One shall in such manner haue a gift of Beatitude lesse then another, and yet hauing it, he would not desire a greater.

cap. 30.

The second point is, that if it were so, that our felicitie were to endure as many yeares as there are droppes of water in the Sea, or graines of sand in the earth; yet it should not bee a compleat, and perfect beatitude. For although the continuance thereof would seeme infinite vnto vs, yet one day it would haue an ende; because the droppes of water, and the graines of sand are numbred before the Lord. But the felicitie which wee expect, shall neuer haue end: for it is eternall life, because wee shall bee vnited to Christ, the fountaine of life. For as the spring thereof which is God, hath no beginning; so it will infuse it selfe into vs eternally by Christ. Therefore we shall there haue an infinite beatitude, and perfect ioy, which shall neuer be taken away from vs.

For the third and last poynt, wee ought to knowe, that this life eternall is promised and assured to all the children of GOD; because (as the Scripture teacheth vs) they are heires of their Father, and coheires with Christ; that they are blessed of God, to receiue the Kingdome prepared for them from the beginning of the world: that they are saued and called by an holy calling, and grace giuen them through Iesus Christ, before all eternitie: That they haue the promise of life and immortalitie, by beleeuing the Gospel; that they are members of Iesus Christ, which is the Way, the Trueth, and the Life, by whom they must come to God, according to the election of him that calleth, that his purpose might remaine firmly in all spirituall blessings, vpon those that beleue in Iesus Christ, (as it is written) Who soeuer beleueneth in him, hath life euerlasting. And as Saint Paul saith, That beeing iustified by his grace, wee shall bee made heires according to the hope of eternall life.

7. The conclusion of this Chapter.

Let vs conclude from the ground of so many sacred testimonies, and diuine reasons, that a man beeing a true Christian Phylosopher, before all things ought to exercise and comfort himselfe in these notable meditations of the life to come, and of the eternall and incomprehensible felicitie which is certainly and infallibly promised to all the children of God. Who by that meanes, are truly and onely happie, and so much the happier in this life, that by the degrees of the blessednesse which Christ hath placed in his Church, by the power of his Spirit, they may further apprehend the excellencie of the glory, and the greatnesse of the ioy, which they shall haue in the kingdome of heaven. For then when their bodies shall rise incorruptible, and bee reunited to their soules fully sanctified, they shall bee intire men, eleuated into the palace of the eternall GOD their Father, there to beholde his face, infinitely much brighter then the Sunne in all his resplendant light, and there enioy the fruits of the prayer of Christ: for those that had been giuen vnto him by God, to be with him, and so conioyned to him, that the Deitie, one onely God, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, shall bee all in them, who thereby beeing replenished and filled with true peace, perfect charitie, all vnderstanding and knowledge, eternall holinesse, onely and perpetuall ioy, incessantly shall sing the Canticle of Ioy and Praise Halle-luiach, All saluation, glorie, honour and power belongeth to the Lord our God.

Apoc. 19. 2.

*The true and onely meanes whereby a Christian (by the second consolation) may know, that hee is the childe of God, thereby to bee made

1 The good and benefit that a Christian hath to know and feele in his conscience, that he is the child of God.

IF wee knew how to reape profit by that little which hath already bin spoken, touching the principall effect of this our second part of Christian Phylosophy, wee would easily draw this Christian conclusion or maxime from thence, that there is no greater ioy, no such contentment in this temporall life, nor any thing surer, nor so necessary, happily and contentedly to passe all the difficulties thereof. Then to know and feele, that we are of the number of those that are the children of God. For this foundation beeing once surely settled in our hearts, we shall alwayes be perswaded, that whatsoever happeneth vnto vs in this world, (bee it neuer so hard and difficult to flesh and blood) is a blessing of God the Father which is in heauen, sent vnto vs, and consequently a meanes, ayd, and way ordained by his prouidence, either to conduct vs in the way of life eternall, or to augment our glory in the same, seeing it is manifest (as you haue heard) that every one shall receiue a reward therein according to the industry that hee hath vsed, through the spirit of God, to attaine thereunto. From whence we learne, alwayes, and in all things to submit our selues to the diuine disposition of God, and at all times, in prosperity or aduersitie, in the day time, or in the night, to haue a speciall regard, and a vigilant eye on God, and to set our whole hearts and cogitations vpon him, that so hee being neuer out of the intire sight of our mindes, wee may bee sure of a good guide to conduct and leade vs, happily through the straights and craggie passages of this life, and of a certaine aid to ouercome and vanquish all the hinderances and worldly impeachments of our saluation.

2. An exterior meanes given vnto vs by God to know his children.

It is true, that it is proper to God onely to know who are his, and whom he elected, and chose to be the same, before the foundation of the world was laid. And yet for one of our most singular comforts, hee hath given vs two principall meanes, whereby he teacheth vs to know who are his children, and whom it hath pleased him to chuse and adopt to be his: to be made participants of his glory. The one exterior, by visible markes to man; the other interior, by the testimonies which hee that is elect of God, feeleth in his soule and conscience. Touching the exterior meanes which maketh vs know, and to be assured that we are the children of God, it consisteth herein, that we are members of the Church of our Lord Iesus Christ. For therefore in the Scriptures it is often called The Kingdome of heauen, because God withdrawing his Church from the power of the Diuel, the Prince of this world, by his Spirit raigneth in all those, that are members of the spouse of our Lord Iesus Christ his Son, more and more sanctifying and gouerning them by the Scepter of his Word, and by that meanes bringeth them to life eternall. In such manner that the Church is as it were the Suburbs, or the gate to enter therein. For which cause also it is called the House of God, that we may euidently know, that all those that dwell therein, by good right are called and reputed the seruants and children of God. As in the same respect, when in the Simbole of the Creed wee haue protested to belecue the holy Catholike Church, wee adde thereunto, The communion of Saints, The remission of sinnes, The resurrection of the dead, and the life euermore. For all these things assure vs, that they which are of the House of God, and members of the Church, are participants of all those treasures and benefits specified in the Creed: and consequently are children of God, and heires of his kingdome. Againe, to the same end, in the Church wee find three markes or signes which are ioined thereunto. The first, that wee learne by that which Iesus Christ saith, My sheepe heare my voice, and follow me: that is a testimony to be the children of God, to shew our selues carefull to heare the Word, and to walke according to the same. The second, we observe in Baptisme, whereof the Scripture saith, that it is a certaine gage that the sins of those which receiue it, are washt away by the blood of Christ, that they are ingrafted and incorporated in his death, and resurrection, and that they are regenerated and clothed with our Sauiour

Sauour Iesus Christ. For from thence it followeth, as S. Paul concludeth, That they are children of God. As likewise the same assurance of our adoption is given vs in the Sacrament of the Eucharist. For the bread & the wine being consecrated in that sacred mystery, to be the communion of the body and blood of Iesus Christ (as the Apostle saith:) it followeth, that in the same banquet, the members of the Church receive spirituall and heavenly food, and life for their soules, and consequently, that as children of God, they shal receiue a happy and permanent life for ever. According to the promise made by the Lord, That he which eateth his flesh, and drinketh his blood, hath life eternall. The third consisteth in that which Saint Luke witnesseth of all faithfull Christians, that they call vpon the name of the Lord: as to the contrary it is said of fooles and workers of iniquitie, That they call not vpon God: which inuocation the holy Ghost noteth to bee of so great consequence, that by the same hee often signifieth and comprehendeth all things which belong to the seruice of God, and which concerne the puritie of the exercise of Religion. As when hee saith, That Abraham built an Altar to the Lord, and called vpon his name. An that when God shall doe wonderfull things in heauen aboue, and signes in the earth belowe; blood and fire, and vapors of smoke, who soeuer shall call vpon the name of the Lord, shall bee saued. Then when the members of the Church assemble together, and lift vp their prayers to God, saying as hee hath taught them, Our Father which art in heauen, &c. in that manner calling him Father, they may bee well assured, that hee acknowledgeth them to bee his children, and that hee will make them feeble the fruites of their lippes, exhausting their prayers, as it is promised them by Christs owne mouth. So it appeareth by that which is said, how euery member of the Church, may and ought to assure themselves, to bee the children of God, by exterior and visible markes to men, and likewise to acknowledge all other Christians living in the same communion with them, to bee their brethren, and children of the same Father: leauing hypocrites and reprobates to the iudgement of God.

3. Interior meanes to assure vs to bee the children of God.

Touching interior meanes, which giue an assurance to a true Christian, to be the child of God, it is certaine, that as it is requisite to open the eyes of the blind, and the eares of the deafe man, to make them see the brightnes of the light, and to heare the voice of him that speaketh: so we, being by nature corrupted, blind & deafe, touching things which belong to God, the holy Ghost must open the eyes and the eares of our vnderstandings & thoughts, that so we may comprehend & satisfie our soules with that which is interiorly reuealed touching our adoptiō. For it is a great misery to be called childrē of the living God, as it pleaseth him to be merciful to vs. Therefore it is his spirit which induceth & sealeth in our harts this reuelation to make vs assured thereof, which he doth by begetting faith in vs, which is as it were the hand wherewith we apprehend this secret of our calling in Christ. And therefore the effects not only of the H. Ghost, making vs to be new born, & regenerated to see the kingdō of God in vs: but also faith which purifieth our hearts and iustificeth vs, are the principal & most assured signes to make vs know, and to assure our consciences, that God hath chosen vs, according to his heauenly providence, in sanctification of the Spirit, to make vs heires of the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen. Therefore S. Paul saith, that the holy Ghost witnesseth to our spirits, that we are childrē of God, in such manner that hauing receiued the spirit of adoptiō, we cry with assurance Abba father, which S. Iohn also teacheth vs, saying, We know that God dwelleth in vs by the spirit which he hath giuen vs. Again, by this we know that we dwell in him, & he in vs: that he hath giuen vs his spirit. And S. Paul by the peace of conscience which we feele in our soules before God, by the free remission of our finnes in the blood of Christ, sheweth & proueth, that we are iustified by faith, & so made the children of God. By Christ, saith he, through faith, we haue access to his grace, wherein we stand: & a litle after, our hope maketh vs not ashamed, because the loue of God is spreade abroad in our hearts, by the holy Ghost, which is giuen vnto vs. Wherein to confirme vs the more, hee saith in another place, After wee haue beleued, wee are sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. To which purpose we haue a notable point of doctrine taught vs, by Saint Barnard, saying, We are certaine and assured of the power of God to saue vs, but what shall wee say touching his will? what is he that knoweth whether he hath deferred loue or hatred? what is he that hath knowne the iudgement of the Lord? or who hath beene his counsellor? In this respect faith must helpe vs, wee must hearken vnto the truth, to the end that the same which is hidden from vs in the fathers secret wiledome, may be reuealed vnto vs by the holy Ghost, and the same spirit bearing witnes in our hearts perswadeth vs that we are the children of God, to the glory of eternall life. From these effects as well of the holy Ghost, as of faith, which is the worke thereof, proceedeth the other, which serueth vs more and more to assure vs of our adoption, that is, that we loue God and our neighbour for the loue of him: From whence also followeth a hatred of euill, and an affection to yeeld obedience vnto God: For if it be so, that the reason why we loue him, proceedeth from this, that hee first loued vs, (as S. Iohn saith,) It followeth that the loue which we bare vnto him, is a testimony that he loueth vs. As Christ by the signes of loue which the sinneful woman shewed vnto him proueth & affirmeth, that God loued her much and had forgiven her many offences, adding thereunto, that he to whom lesse grace is shewed, loveth not so much. So the light of the Moone, is a certaine argument, that the Sonne shineth vpon it, for otherwise it hath no light. And in summer, the heate which wee feelee vpon the stones, about noone time, is a signe that the sonne shineth vpon them, and heateth them with his beames. Now by nature, and our first generation, since the fall of Adam, we are nothing but darkenes, cold and subiect to the dominion of sinne: There is not one that searcheth after God, that doth good, or that knoweth the way of peace. Then to the contrary. If we walke in the loue and feare of God, addicting our hearts to his seruice, cheerefully imploying our selues in the workes of charity, that alteration and change in vs, is a certaine testimony of our regeneration, and that the Son of Eternall light and of all righteousness, shineth vpon our soules and inflameth them in the loue of him, by his heavenly power, and consequently that we are children of God. The tree (saith Christ) is knowne by his fruits. Then, when we bring forth the workes of righteousness, of holines and of Christian charity, wee are trees planted by the holy Ghost in the sacred vergiers of God, and as it were a part of the foundation of the inheritance, which we shall enioy Eternally in heauen. To this we must adde, that which Saint Iohn saith, that Charity proceedeth from God, and euery one that loveth, is borne of God, and knoweth God, heerein was that loue of God made manifest among vs, because he sent that his onely begotten Son into this world, that we might liue through him, and that we should haue boldnesse in the day of iudgement, for as he is, so are we in this world, as a certaine scale of our adoption.

4. The conclusion of this Chapter.

Therefore wee conclude, that as the heate and brightnesse of a cole, is a signe that there is fire in it, and as the motions and actions of the body, are certaine testimonies that it liueth, and that the soule is within it: so the loue of God and of our neighbours, the peace and quietnesse of our consciences before his diuine Maiestie, whom wee adore, feeling our selues iustified by faith in Iesus Christ our Redeemer, the changing of life, which touching the flesh consisteth in that which concerneth the fruites of the Spirit regenerated, which moueth and inciteth a man to an affection to walke in the feare and obedience of God, according to his word: all these things I say, ioyned with the feeling which the holy Ghost giueth vnto our hearts, accomplish the interior meanes, which with all certaintie and assurance teach vs to know that we are the children of God, and so to bee happy for ever. And even as the exterior meanes to giue vs the same assurance, consisteth in this, that we should be members of the Church of Christ, let vs heare and follow his voice, communicating the holy Sacraments ordained by him, and calling vpon God all the dayes of our liues, in the name of our Lord Iesus Christ, and as he hath taught vs.

What meanes Christians haue, for a third consolation, to apply the workes of their adoption in Iesus Christ, to assure themselves thereof, and consequently of their salvation. Chap. 3.

1. Two kinds of temptations, which shake and weaken the constancie of man, to assure himselfe to be the childe of God.

THe meanes already declared before, are certain & infallible, to assure all true Christians, that God hath adopted the to himself in Iesus Christ, to be of the number of his children and heires of eternall life, and so to settle their mindes with great comfort and confidence of living happily for ever. But there are two sorts of temptations, which before all others, are a meanes to shake this confidence. The one, which proceedeth from our selues, either for want of well applying in our hearts and minds the exterior testimonies which God presenteth and giueth vnto vs of our adoption, to be members of his Church, for by a feeling of the want (as we thinke) of interior and spirituall marks, by reason of the small quantitie and weaknesse which is in vs of those diuine graces. The other temptation proceedeth from another cause, and specially consisteth in common and long afflictions, which ordinarily assaile vs in this life. Now as there is nothing of greater importance then the saluation of our soules; so there is nothing which more grieuously troubleth and afflicteth weak consciences, desirous of life eternall, then doubting and fearing not to be children of God, and of the number of the blessed. For from thence proceedeth sadnesse and anguish of mind, which none can comprehend, but those onely, that haue had experience thereof.
and

2 True and assured meanes to comfort the faithfull against the distrust of their indignitie, merite, and ignorance, in the secrets of election and saluation.

To aid our infirmities concerning that which toucheth the first kinde of temptation aforesaid, it is singularly and specially to be noted, for one of our consolations that many fall into this distresse, because they pretend with themselves, to resolute of their owne saluation, by an examination whether they are worthy to bee the children of God. Now as no man is nor can bee worthy their doubts and distrusts easily make them fall into despaire. But there are others, which content themselves in their curiosities, onely to comprehend, whether they bee of the number of those that are elected and predestinated, whose names are written in the booke of life. Whereof Saint Iohn speaketh, thinking they cannot otherwise assure themselves, that God loueth and holdeth them for his children, if presently they haue not perfect vnderstanding of the great misterie of Gods secret and eternal counsell. And yet it consisteth not in the profound examination of worth and merites, nor yet in the high and curious searching into the predestination of the Saints, that wee must seeke for the assurance of our adoption. But onely in the holy doctrine of the Gospell, which in proper tearmes reuealeth vnto vs the markes of our vocation, regeneration, iustification, and sanctification, whereof wee haue spoken before, and whereby wee are assured to attaine to eternall happinesse. Saint Paul comprehendeth them in these degrees, Rom. 8. 28. saying, For those whom God knewe before, hee also predestinated to bee made like to the Image of his Sonne, that hee might bee the first borne among many brethren: And those whom hee predestinated, them also hee called, them also hee iustified, and whom hee iustified, them hee also glorified. For every one will confesse, that they who in the counsell and eternall decree of God, are elected and predestinated to bee made like vnto Christ, representing in them the image of him which maketh them fit for celestially glorie, are children of God.

Now those that are baptized in the Church, and illuminated with the knowledge of the Gospell, beleene their sinnes are washed and made cleane by the blood of the Lambe; by the full satisfaction made by Christ to the iustice of God; and ioyfully beare their crosse; to follow Christ, and to be made conformable to him, as the holy Spirit endoweth them with grace, are called and iustified at last to bee glorified in the kingdome of heauen, as the whole Scriptures witnesse with the Apostle Saint Paul.

From thence it followeth, that they are children of God, and that so certainly, that the great Doctour of the Gentiles, opposing the will and power of God against all impeachments, addeth, What shall wee then say to these things? If God bee on our side, who can bee against vs? As also to the same ende in another place hee maketh this conclusion, saying: For if by the offence of one (that is Adam) death reigned through one, much more shall they which receive that abundance of grace, and gift of that righteousness, reigne in life through one, that is Iesus Christ. Therefore let vs note, that in this reuelation of the counsell of God, touching our adoption, these two things are specially to be considered that is; that there is perfect and intire saluation in one Iesus Christ; and that the meanes to obtaine this saluation, is to beleue in him. And then when this truth is pronounced and made knowne vnto vs, God reuealeth two points more. The first, that hee will make vs participants of this saluation of his Sonne.

*1. Pet. 1. 24.
Heb. 9. 14.
Matth. 16. 24.
Rom 8. 30.
and 5. 17.*

*Acts 4. 12.

The second, that it is his pleasure, that we shal consent vnto, and beleue the testimonie which is giuen vnto vs by his word, that we are of the number of his children, that we may bee saued. And to that end S. Iohn saith, He that beleueneth in the Sonne of God, hath the witnesse in himselfe: hee that beleueneth not God, hath made him a lier, and this is the record, to wit, that God hath giuen vs eternall life, and this life is in his Sonne. That is it also which wee learne by these wordes of the Apostle, That God being willing more abundantly to shew vnto the heires of promise, the stablenesse of his counsell, bound himselfe by an oath, that by two immutable things, wherein it is impossible that God should lie, wee might haue consolation, which haue our refuge to lay hold vpon the hope which is set before vs: which hope we haue as an ancre of the soule, both sure and steadfast, and it entreth into that which is within the vaile, whither the forerunner is for vs entred, euen Iesus Christ. Wherevnto we must also referre this text of the Scripture: That faith is by hearing; and hearing by the word of God. That we must beleue the Gospell, and in the name of Iesus Christ, and that to haue faith, to beleue in the Gospell, and in the name of Iesus Christ, is not onely to beleue, that in him there is redemption, and life eternall for all the faithfull, (for the Diuell beleueth so much) but it is to beleue that this saluation is in Iesus Christ, for euery one of vs particularly, and to say with Esay, For vnto vs a child is borne, and vnto vs a sonne is giuen, according to that which the angel told the shepheards, vnto you this day is borne a sauiour, which is Christ the Lord.

Againe, it is to beleue, that the will of God is, that we shall be his children, and heires of his kingdome, and that he will haue vs constantly to beleue it. These foundations thus laid, are so many true & sure means, for vs to apply to our selues the markes of our adoption in Iesus Christ, with all assurance of his paternall loue towards vs. For why should wee doubt, and trouble our peace of conscience, to wander and stray from the truth, through Philosophy, and vaine deceite: through the traditions of men, according to the rudiments of the world, touching the inquisition of our owne righteousness, and worthines? wee are bound to obey, and to content our selues with that which is written, Whosoever beleueth in him shall not perish but haue euerlasting life. Then it is no presumption steadfastly to beleue it, but obedience to God and most pleasing to his maiesty; yea an honor which he requireth at our hands, faithfully to beleue his testimony, and thereby confirme it to bee true, as Saint Iohn saith. It is true, that Christ in the Scriptures saith not I will saue this, or that particular man, naming them by their names: For if that were so, then we might haue cause to doubt of our saluation, thinking that the Lord did not speake of vs, but of others whose names were like ours. But when we heare him say, that hee came into the world, to saue sinners, either we must deny the name of a sinner, or confesse that he speaketh of vs, & that he took vpon him our flesh, suffered, died, and rose againe, to obtaine life eternall for vs. Therefore let vs boldly make this conclusion & say, Iesus Christ is come, he hath been crucified, he descended into hell, he triumphed ouer sinne, death, and the diuell, to redeeme & saue sinners, I confesse and acknowledge my name to be among them, (for I am a sinner) therefore he came to saue me. Againe, when he saith, Come vnto me all you, that are weary and laden, and I will ease you, we ought well to note these words: (All you) and euery faithful Christian should thereupon conclude, that it is to him that Christ speaketh, and promisseth this ease, if he be one of them which is laden and feeleth the burthen of his sinnes.

Touching the great secret of the counsell of God, concerning Election and Predestination, it is so farre in this point, from giuing vs matter to bee doubtfull of the assurance of our adoption, that to the contrary there is nothing whatsoever that should more steadfastly confirme vs therein. The holy Scripture evidently witnesseth in diuers places, that God hath elected and chosen some of the children of Adam to saluation and eternall life, and hath not made the rest partakers of that benefit: and that this election is grounded vpon the onely goodnes and mercy of the Lord towards them, whose names are written in the booke of life. If we cannot vnderstand, and neuertheles desire to comprehend the causes and reasons of the points of this doctrine of the holy Ghost, let vs not stray out of the way in our curious inquisitions in such manner as that wee should seeme to controule or call in question the euident testimonies which God giueth vs in his word, concerning his iudgements. For seeing that in God, there is wisdom, goodnesse, mercy, righteousness, power, and perfect & infinit truth, and that his essence is nothing but wisdom, goodnes, & righteousness, which infinitely surpasseth all the capacity, and vnderstanding of man, it followeth that all our wisdom consisteth herein; that we beleue, although wee comprehend it not, that the wil of God is the rule of all righteousness. This is a certen principle of Christian

Religion

Religion, & wherein there is a true sanctificatiō of the name of God: as to the contrary, it is an euident signe of impiety, a kind of sacrilege, and a dangerous presumption in vs, to seek to satisfie our owne naturall reason by the examination of the works of God; in the profundity whereof he wil haue man to humble himselfe, feeling his owne ignorance. For the cause may well be secret and hidden from vs, but yet not vniust.

Therefore, how much more the iudgements of God, Creator of all things, are obscure; so much the more wee must receiue them with great humilitie and reuerence. Hee that goes about to controule them, shal (as the Wise man saith) be ouerwhelmed or confounded with the glory thereof. And wee know that Saint Paul taken vp into the third heauen, and there hauing heard things which cannot bee spoken, knew well how farre hee ought to presume to reueale the mysteries of the wisdome, and prouidence of God. Every man may see how resolute he is in this doctrine of Election, and how constant he sheweth himselfe to oppose the onely will, wisdome, power, and glory of God, against all the inquisitions and replies of men. Then let vs content ourselues, to beleue that which the Lord witnesseth in his word, and let vs attribute to his wisdome and infinit power, to know and doe that which wee cannot comprehend, humbly adoring his iudgements: and for the rest, let vs beleue the testimonie and markes which the holy Ghost giueth vs touching the elect, and the meanes which wee haue to apply the same to our selues, as we said before.

3. The conclusion of this Chapter.

For conclusion, wee learne, that the Gospel which is preached vnto vs in the Church, containeth the reuelation, and many certaine warrants of our adoption, specially the Sacraments which confirme vs therein. For they are (saith Saint Augustine) as a visible word, representing the grace of the message of saluation: But besides that, they are communicated vnto vs, and wee receiue them. Therefore also they serue as it were to put vs in reall possession of our vocation, and to giue vs full assurance of eternall life. The Minister of the Church doing his duetie to preach the Gospel, pronounceth to all Christians, the grace contained in them: But in Baptisme it is directed to euery one of vs particularly, to assure vs of the remission of our sins, and of this, that by putting on Christ by that sacred washing, wee are made children of God. As also in the communion of the Eucharist, the Minister telling vs from Christs owne mouth, That the flesh of Christ is meate indeede, and his bloud very drinke, and that whosoever eateth that flesh, and drinketh that bloud, dwelleth in Christ, to liue for ever. It is more and more to confirme euery one of vs in the faith of our saluation, and to assure vs that the Lord giueth vs his body wholly, with all good things, that we should bee vnited to him, and so with him bee made children of our Father which is in heauen, and heires of his glory.

Thus wee see the true and onely meanes, how to apply the markes of the children of God, vnto our selues, to assure vs of that blessednesse to come. But before all things, let vs specially consider this, and comfort our selues therein, which is, that faith whereby wee apprehend all these great benefits of the Lord, is a gift of his grace, and proceedeth from the operation of the power of his spirit: (as the Apostle saith) For this is it which wee must acknowledge in the temptations which moue a difficulty in vs to beleue the exterior and interior testimonies of the will of God towards vs, touching our adoption. And further, we must know that it is requisite and necessarie, that that great Master, and our good Father should worke in our hearts, by his spirit, therein to beget, intertaine, and strengthen this faith. The which grace also is assured to all that are elect, as it is written, that all those in the primitiue Church, that were ordained to eternall life, beleued it, and to that end our duty is to pray to God for the gift of the holy Spirit, in the name of Iesus Christ, and to persevere constantly in this prayer, with full assurance grounded vpon his promise, that he will giue it vnto vs, and that so, accompanying the vertue and efficacy thereof with the abundant testimonies of his prouidence and loue towards vs, hee will cause vs certainly to apply them to our selues, to liue peaceably and contentedly here on earth, and after this life happily in heauen.

That Christians for their fourth consolation, ought and may bee assured and certaine to bee the children of God, although the markes of their adoption bee weake and feeble in them.

Chapter 4.

1. Not to feeble in vs, the peace and ioy of true faith, is a testimony of humane infirmities, but not that wee are without faith.

Rom. 4. 2. 5.

THe feeling that we haue of the want, or (properlyerto tearme it,) of the weakenes of the interior & spirituall marks of our adoption, is oftentimes the cause of great trouble and disquietnesse in our consciences, and hindereth many men from applying the testimonies of the grace of God to the peace of their soules, apprehending that by incredulitie, they doe not fall from the hope of saluation. Therefore it is necessarie, that for one of our consolations, and to remaine firme in the hope of the glory of God, which confoundeth not: Wee should first vnderstand, that there is great difference betweene incredulity and weakenesse of faith, which (as wee haue already noted) is the worke of the holy Ghost in vs, and whereby wee apprehend the assurance of our vocation. For an incredulous man, or an Infidel taketh no care for his saluation, or otherwise, reiecting the sauing grace, which is onely in Iesus Christ: or neglecting it, seeketh else wherefor some other thing to procure peace and contentment to his soule.

But a faithfull Christian, earnestly desireth to be saued, and knoweth that hee cannot be saued but in Christ, and therefore seeketh his blisse onely in him, and alwaies feeleth an affection in his heart to augment this assurance, which is that there is reconciliation for him by Iesus Christ the onely mediator betweene God and man, although hee doth not thoroughly feele the peace and spirituall ioy of such grace, so cleerely in his soule, as faith requireth and by degrees in the end begetteth in him. For it is not written, that hee which feeleth, but he that beleueth, hath life eternall, and as faith is of things spirituall and inuisible, so the vnderstanding of the nature thereof and of the fruits and effects that follow it, consists more in consenting, (proceeding from a peaceable spirit,) to that which the word of God teacheth vs, then in a full apprehension and perfect knowledge of so excellent a gift. Which we see in the complaint made by Danid, & that which Iesus Christ after him made, saying, My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me. For there we heare the testimony of faith, in these words, My God, my God, but in that which followeth it appeareth how much this faith was altered, & distract from the entire apprehension & lively feeling, of that perfect ioy whereunto the holy Ghost by degrees leadeth the elect. For when the Prophet saith, that he is abandoned and forsaken of God, it seemeth to be the complaint of a man in dispaire. And in truth, when a man feelles no comfort in God, it is not for him to brag or boast of faith. Here we haue two notable points of doctrine, which although in apparence may be iudged to be contrary one vnto the other, yet they daily enter together into the heart of the faithfull, When they are troubled with the interior combat of the spirit against the flesh, in the middle of their most feruent, and hot burning cares, anguishes, and sorrowes, on the one side discovering their humane infirmity, and on the other side yeelding a testimony of their faith. Which in this maner, may wel be so little, and so weake in our hearts, that it produceth not the spirituall fruits that are truly & lively felt by vs. But if those that finde and feele themselves to be in that estate, desire to haue that right feeling, and aske it of God by praier: that their desire & praier sheweth, that the holy Ghost is in the, & that they haue faith. For those are true fruits of their regeneration, by that spirit (as Saint Paul saith) which helpeth our infirmities, and maketh request for vs with sighs, which cannot be expressed, when we know not what to pray as we ought, such holy affections being motions of the holy Ghost in vs, are witnesses of our faith, how little and weake soeuer we feele it, and by consequent that we are the children of God.

Rom. 8. 27. 6.

2. The feares and distrusts of the elect deprive them not of true faith.

Wee must also vnderstand, that the faith of the elect ceaseth not to bee true faith, although they feele doubts, feares, and distrusts in themselves. For if they take not a pleasure in such corruptions, to entertaine and maintaine them, but are grieved thereat, and seeke to withstand them, with a desire to encrease as much as they can in the assurance of their saluation in Iesus Christ. It is another euident combat betweene the spirit and the flesh, betweene faith and distrust, and betweene the will and the deede (as Saint Paul saith) Rom. 7. 18. 24 and where faith hath residents, and is sealed in the hearts of the children of God, although it be assailed, by all those stormes and assaults of sinne, wherewith they are still encompassed. Therefore also, in seeking to surmount such imperfections, while they hope for the diuine Rom. 8. 24. 37 promises which they see not, they patiently attend, saith the Apostle, vntill such time as they become conquerors in all things through him that loueth them. If we consider the course of Dauids life. There is no mirror of faith (in all the whole Scriptures) more notable, nor more euident to be seene, then in him: and yet neuer any faithfull Christian was more assailed with feares and doubts then hee. What complaints did hee make: saying, Will the Lord absent himselfe for euer? And will hee shew no more fauour? Is his mercy cleane gone for euer? Doth his promise faile for euer more? Hath God forgotten to bee mercifull? Hath hee sent vp his tender mercies in displeasures? Psal 77. 7, 8, 9, &c. And for conclusion, hee vseth speeches like a man in dispaire, saying, And I said this is my death. And yet he was not viterly void of faith, otherwise hee would not haue begunne the Psalm thus, My voice came to God when I cried, in the day of my tribulation I sought the Lord, and ceased not in the night, my soule refused comfort, I did thinke vpon God, and was troubled, I praied, and my spirit was full of anguish. Whereby we learne, that euen then, when the vehemency of his sorrowes and anguishes, and the infirmities of his flesh, constrained him to sigh, mourne, and so bitterly to complaine: faith made him to remember his error, and to correct his fault, in such manner that he directed his praiers to God, and assuredly called him his Lord, in whom hee hoped for succour. Wherein he obserued a good method, opposing his hope in God against his troubles, and by a holy inuocation moderated the greatnesse of his anguishes, which afterward hee bewailed. For when the afflictions of our flesh beginne to mooue vs, and that wee cannot easily restraîne them, but to the contrarie are by them led out of the bounds of reason, it is conuenient for vs at the first to repress and keepe them downe. So Dauid making Faith a Rampier against murmuring, bridled his senses that they might not exceed measure, in such sort that all the complaints which hee made in that Psalm, are but shewes of this grieffe, and dispaire, which assailed the hope hee had in God, and of the combat which he sustained against such temptations.

The Apostles also are noted in the Gospel to haue had a weake and obscure faith touching their vnderstandings, before the resurrection of Iesus Christ, and yet much weaker in heart, when the Lord was apprehended by the Iewes, and they forsooke him, one of them viterly denying him. Yet wee say not, that they were without faith in that their so great weakenesse, no more then when they were in the Ship in a great tempest, they cried vnto Christ, saying, Save vs wee perish, and hee called them not Infidels, nor vnfaithfull, but men of little faith, and fearefull: and hearing them granted their desire. As it is written, A brused Reede shall he not breake, and the smoking flaxe shall he not quench. But rather supporting the weake, hee will giue them grace to encrease the gifts of the spirit: and to waxe stronger and stronger in faith (saith the Apostle) as in the person of his Apostles, hee hath taught vs to pray vnto God, that hee will be pleased to encrease faith in vs. The wisdom of the most perfect Christian is still more and more to profit and encrease in knowledge of holinesse and righteoutnesse. Knowing that in all spirituall blessings there is but a beginning, and an imperfection in the forwardest and most compleat Christians here in this life. But the perfection whereunto we must aspire, and the accomplishing of our vocation cannot be perfect, till wee enter into heaven. In the meantime, to turne vs out of the way, and so shake and weaken our hope, the Diuell casteth his fire darts in our faces, which wee must repulse, and seeke to quench vpon the shield of Faith, (as Saint Paul saith) with the liuing water of the holy Ghost, that they enter not into our hearts. For what assaults and combats soeuer the Diuels maketh against vs, so long as he possesseth not the heart, where faith is seated, he is driven out, in such manner, that the doubts, distrusts, feares, and all other temptations which assaile, and enter into the faculties of the soule, can not hurt vs. They may well trouble vs, or hurt vs, but not with an incurable wound.

3. A considerable distinction betwene the two principall effects of faith, alwaies powerfull to assure vs of our adoption.

Wee must know how to distinguish these two effects or fruits of faith, That is, quietnesse and peace of conscience before God, and sanctification, which consisteth in newnes of life: For as the first, is a most cleare and euident testimony, of the efficacy and effect of the holy Ghost, dwelling, and working in vs; so the second, which giueth vs an affection to walke holily and righteously here on earth, sheweth, that faith is in our hearts, it being the fountaine and spring of good workes. Then, if one of these two fruits seemes to languish and become weake, the other sufficeth to assure vs that wee are of the number of the faithfull, and consequently, children of God. For as fire, which naturally subsisteth of two effects (that is, flame and heate) although the flame goeth out, yet by the heate thereof, wee are perswaded, that it is naturall fire, and not painted. So when the feeling of peace of conscience wanteth in vs, and neuerthelesse, the affection to the workes of the spirit (as loue towards God, and a desire to liue according to his commandements) are yet resting in the soule: That fruit of faith, is a certaine testimony to euery Christian, that faith is in his heart, though in small measure, and very weake. For, if we haue but a sparke of true faith, we are children of God, because Faith is of such force, that how little soeuer it be, yet it apprehendeth and layeth hold on Christ Iesus to saluation. And to speake truly, when every one of vs shall looke well into his owne conscience, it will euidently appeare, that there is very fewe or none that haue a great measure of faith, that the number of those that haue a meane faith, are very few, and that there are many that haue but a very small measure thereof. But God supporteth our infirmities, distributing so much of that celestiall gift vnto vs, as hee seeth to bee expedient for his glory, and our saluation. For to speake properly, it is Christ which saueth vs, and not our faith; but onely in that it is the instrument, and as it were the hand, whereby wee lay hold vpon, and receive the grace of redemption, which is brought to vs from heauen. For Faith how little soeuer it be in the elect, apprehendeth and receiveth Christ the Saviour of the world, wholly and not halfe, as a childe taketh and holdeth a whole apple with his litle hand, although it bee not so strong and firme as a mans hand. Wherefore, as hee that is in a darke obscure Tower, seeth not the light of the Sunne but at a little hole, may as well assure himselfe that the Sunne shineth vpon his Tower, as hee that sees it out of an open window: so although that by the cloudes of distrust, or some other infirmity, wee are hindred from feeling the Sonne of righteousnesse, shine brightly, and forcibly vpon our soules: neuerthelesse, if therein wee haue the testimony of some small beame thereof, it is sufficient to assure vs, that the light of life shineth vpon vs, to free vs from the darkenesse of death; and therefore that we are the children of God, and heires of the Kingdome of heauen. But as that ought greatly to comfort vs in the weakenesse of our faith: so it should be a sharpe spur to thrust and put vs forward, and to force vs to encrease therein, that so much the cleerelyer and liuelier we may obtaine the peace and ioy of the holy Ghost in our consciences, whereby we may boldlier resist against all temptations, and more and more glorifie our Lord God.

4. Inclination to sinne, ought not to make the faithfull fall from, or to doubt of the certaintie of the promises of God touching saluation.

Many men take occasion to doubt of their adoption, when they consider the quality of this point, that faith cannot be without good workes: for feeling themselves to be great sinners, they are of opinion that they are not the children of God. And to say truth, it is a lamentable thing, that there is no more zeale in vs of the glory of God: no more seruent loue towards our neighbors, nor no better amendment of life. But if we haue begun to hate and fly from sinne, if we feele a disliking of our infirmities and corruptions, if hauing offended God, we are sorry and grieved for it; if we desire and indeuor our selues to offend him no more; if we shunne the occasions, if we seeke and labour to walke in the commandements of

of God, according to our vocations, and if wee pray vnto God to giue vs grace so to doe: let vs certainly beleue, that all those good desires and affections, which cannot proceede but from the holy Ghost, are as many testimonies and assurances vnto vs, that he dwelleth in vs, and by consequent, that we are children of God, as Saint Paul teacheth vs, Rom. 8. 5. & c. where he maketh a comparison betweene those that liue according to the spirit of God, and those that liue after the lusts of the flesh. For as we are the posterity of Adam, and so naturally enclined to all vices and corruptions, it followeth, that it is a signe and token in vs of regeneration, and so to be of the family of Christ, when we dislike of our own infirmities, and struing as much as we can against them, seeke to please God. We know that he commaundeth vs to loue him with all our hearts, with all our soules, and with all our strengthes, but as we cannot know him here in this world, but in a part, and obscurely, so we loue him in part and that very little, the perfection thereof is referued to bee performed in heaven: that whereunto we can attaine here on earth, is that as well in truth as in humility, we acknowledge how imperfect we are in the duties of holines and charity which God requireth at our hands, to whom it pleaseth him, so to accomplish his mercy in pardoning vs, his power in sustaining and vpholding vs, and his promise in sauing vs. The holinesse, loue towards God, and the obedience which wee owe vnto him, are oftentimes signified in the holy Scriptures, by the feare of his name, which Dauid calleth the beginning of wisdom, Therefore whosoever feeleth such loue and reuerence in himselfe towards God, that he feareth to offend him, is one of the number of his children. And we haue this feare in vs, when we are carefull to fly the occasions and inticements which moue vs vnto sinne, when we take a pleasure in the commandements of God, and that having offended him by ignorance, vnawares, or by any other humane infirmity, we feele a displeasure & disliking the same in our hearts, with a resolution by Gods grace to sinne no more. Therefore Saint Iohn saith, whosoever is borne of God, sinneth not, that is to say, that although they haue certaine vices and imperfections in them, neuertheless, sinne raigneth not in them, neither doe they willingly addiect their mindes to doe euill, but to the contrary, feele that combate in their soules, which Saint Paul representeth vnto vs in his owne person, disallowing and disliking that which they doe, because it is not that which they would doe, wherein neuertheless, they haue no occasion to excuse themselves, but rather to sigh, and cry out, on the one side with the same Apostle and to say, Oh wretched man that I am who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? and on the other side, to feele the comfort which he addeth thereunto saying, I thanke God through Iesus Christ our Lord, and for what? because saith he, that although in my flesh, in that inferiour part of my nature, and in the reliques of corruption, I serue the law of sinne, there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, which in their mindes, that is, in that part thereof which is regenerated, serue the law of God, and so walke not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

Let vs therefore know, that when we feele any doubt in our selues of our adoption, for want of yeelding that obedience vnto God, which he requireth at our hands. The Diuell is hard by vs, to shake and make vs wauer in faith, perswading vs, that we must be saued by our workes, or at the least partly, and thereby make our selues companions of the immaculate lambe, which taketh away the sinnes of the world. To which temptation let vs make answer and say, that we know well, that there is nothing of our owne well doing, that can subliste, to iustifie vs before God, that our good deedes extend not vnto him, and that wee are most great and grieuous sinners. But on the other side, that the Gospell teacheth vs, That Christ came into the world to saue sinners, & that there is no saluation but in him, & that seeing we feele the affections of the spirit in our selues, we are of the spirit, and absolved from the day of wrath, which the reprobate shal feele, that taking pleasure in our spirits or in the inward man, in the obedience of God, he accepteth vs in his Sonne Iesus Christ to be holy and righteous, receiuing of vs that desire to walke in his wayes, for a seruice agreeable and pleasing vnto him: and to be short, that he accepteth his workes in vs, and pardoneth ours. If we perseuere in this manner, to oppose and withstand the temptations of the Diuell, and to meditate vpon so many notable doctrines of the holy Scriptures, therein fortifying our selues by ardent and zealous praier vnto God, they are so many certaine testimonies to assure vs that we are the children of God. It is true, that msny of the elect, oftentimes finde themselves, not to be onely luke warme, but also cold as ice, in the effects and fruits of their regeneration, And that there is none so holy and well aduised, which doth not slide, stumble and goe astray, and sometimes takes a great fall: but such defaults and falles

Math. 26. 74. And so their faults turne to good, and are profitable instructions for them. Saint Peter denyed Iesus Christ three times, cursing himselfe, yet we will not therefore affirme, that then the grace of the spirit of God, had withdrawne it selfe from him, nor that he had no faith: but to the contrary, Christ hauing prayed vnto God, that it should not faile in his Disciple, and hauing without doubt beene heard, it continued in that Apostle, yet weak, and strongly assailed, but not beaten downe, nor dead.

Psal. 51. 11. David hauing committed adultery and murther, acknowledged and confessed his sinnes, and besought God by prayer not to take his holy spirit from him: then he had not lost it, but it was in him, (like a fire couered ouer with ashes,) and did not then shew his diuine vertue, to withhold the Prophet from sinne. It is most true, that the gifts and calling of God, are without repentance. But let vs remember, that the great and grosse faults of those two excellent seruants of God, ought to be considered by vs, not onely to the end that vnderstanding that they were not forsaken nor abandoned by the spirit of God, wee should not enter into dispaire in our infirmities: but to serue vs for true mirrors of humane fragility, thereby to make vs know and acknowledge, that when we sinne not in such manner, it is by the power and Spirit of God which preserueth vs from it, and also to aduertise vs, continually to stand vpon our gard, that we may be releued, when we haue sinned, afterward firmly to resolute with our selues, to walke in holinesse and righteousnesse all the dayes of our liues. That is it which we must expect from God which worketh in vs, both the will and the deed, according to his good pleasure. Therefore let vs be carefull euery day to pray vn-

And againe, Oh my God I cry by day, but thou hearest not, and by night but haue no audience. But behold how he witnesseth, that hauing persevered to cry incessantly to God, he obtained the fruits of his requests. I waited patiently for the Lord (saith he) and he inclined vnto me, and heard my cry. Iesus Christ himselfe exhorteth vs to the same duty, by the similitude or example of the widdow importuning the iudgeto doe her iustice, and at the last by her importunity obtained it. Heare (saide hee) what this vnrighteous iudge saith, yet because this widdow troubleth mee, I will doe her right. And will not God which is our Father, and our Savior, (Iust, and louing righteousnesse,) heare the prayer of his children if they call vpon him night and day? for here wee must specially consider, that seeing we aske him the holy Spirit, which Christ promised vnto vs, wee desire that which belongeth vnto vs, by his promise, and therefore God will giue it vs.

And likewise, seeing we aske him encrease of faith, and grace to serue and obey him; we aske that which he enioineth vs to haue, and which dependeth on him, in such sort, that they cannot be separated from his Spirit. Therefore wee neither can, nor must doubt, that when we aske that which is according to his will, that wee shall not be heard. But we must giue him this honour, to referre our selues to his wisdom, touching the time when wee shall feele, and fully receiue the fruits of our prayers; instantly, allowed, yea, before wee aske: as also touching the manner and forme how wee shall be aided and releued in our weakenesse. If Iesus Christ had healed the Cananite womans daughter, when shee first besought him to doe it, her faith had not beene so great, nor so much extolled in the Church, even to the worlds end. And Saint Paul hauing praied vnto God diuers times, that hee would deliuer him from the messenger of Satan, which buffeted him: hee did more for him, (as hee himselfe confesseth) causing his diuine power to persist in the infirmity of his seruant, who protesteth, as enioying the fruits of his prayers (although it was in other sort then hee demanded) that from thence forward hee would reioice in his infirmities; and that although he was weake of himselfe, hee was strong in God. Whereby wee are admonished, that in all the assaults which wee sustaine in this world, whether they be made by the Diuell, or by our owne flesh, wee must not be discouraged, when God doth not satisfie our requests, in such manner, or so soone as wee desire them; but content our selues, that wee haue his grace (as hee said to Saint Paul) that is, that God doth not forsake vs, and that hee alwaies knoweth his time to prouide that which is necessarie for vs. For to conclude, it sheweth that hee alwaies heareth and granteth our requests, when he guideth our hearts by his spirit, and sustaineth vs by his diuine consolation, that we may not lose, nor fall from hope and patience.

5. Conclusion of this Chapter.

Let vs conclude vpon all those propositions, that seeing God (by the interior testimony of his spirit, and by the other marks aforesaid,) hath made vs feeble, that we are of the number of his children, There is no temptation, weaknes, nor feblenes of faith, that can make vs fall from the firm hope of our adoption, & calling in Iesus Christ. For as houses that are built & set vpon foundations of hard stone, withstand inundations of waters, overflowings of rivers and stormes and tempests of windes, and stand firmly, without taking any hurt: So mens soules which are once grounded vpon the rocke of the promises of God, and are made fast to the feare of his name. by the ciment of his celestially loue, courageously resist against all temptations, and euill incounters of defiance, without any great hurt, and therefore also we must beleue, that being of the number of the elect, called by our heavenly father to saluation, according to his eternall counsell, we can neuer perish, for such is the reuelation of the spirit of truth, in all the sacred oracles of the Scriptures. And therefore the fruits and effects of the Spirit, with all the graces depending thereon, necessary for our saluation, can not lose so much of their strength in our infirmities, that they are not alwaies of so sufficient force, to make vs liue happily, and in the end, to bring vs to the fruition of his celestially glory.

The first consolation is, that a Christian Philosopher, ought to make use of the afflictions and miseries of humane life: thereby to perswade himselfe to be the childe of God, by the excellent fruits which they produce. Chapter 5.

1. Common and ordinarie complaints made by men, touching the miseries of their liues

WE said before, that the second kind of temptation, which shaketh the assurance that wee ought to haue of our adoption, consisteth in the common and long afflictions and miseries, which ordinarily accompany vs in this life, and to speake true, who can calculate the number, or reckon the diuersities thereof? Some complaine of diseases, pouertie, reproches, slanders, hatred, contempt, losse of friends, increasing of enemies, and of diuers other kindes of disgraces, and discontentments which trouble and annoy man, and most commonly the vprightest men. Others complaine of losse of their goods, and their estates. Others are grieved to be driuen out of their native Countries, or that they are persecuted in other manner, and that by their neere friends and alies, they are brought into great calamitie and trouble of minde. But the worst is, we haue a great number (and of those specially, which take one them the name of faithfull Christians fearing God) who in their troubles, say and affirme, that they haue seen and found nothing all their liues, but signes of the diuine wrath of God towards them, instead of the testimony of his loue, and conuenient blessings to his children. Therefore we must strengthen and fortifie our selues with necessarie rampiers and defences against such assaults of our flesh, wherein Satan hath a great part.

2. God is the author of tribulation, which are foreshewed and promised by the Scriptures to his Children.

Then let vs first vnderstand, that in truth such complaints, and wrong conclusions proceede from great ignorance and weakenesse. For if wee knew well, that GOD is the author, and the cause of the tribulations which man endureth; and specially, that he hath at all times prepared and sent them for the profit of his children, instead of being moued and troubled at them, because our flesh iudgeth them to be harsh, wee should be more confirmed in the assurance of our adoption, and future happinesse. In the beginning of our discourse we heard, how God our Lord and Creator, is the first, soveraigne, and vniuersal cause of all things, in such maner, as they receiue all their essence of his Deity, and that without it, they should all in an instant be reduced and brought to nothing, and that so their essence, since they receiued the same, and all their gouernment and condition, dependeth vpon his eternall will, which conducteth and directeth his workes to their end. In such sort that as the essence, the life, and the moouing of humane bodies vpon earth, depend vpon the soule, which is within them, and without it they can neither mooue nor liue: so God is life, and as the soule of all creatures, and that without him they are nothing, neither can effect any thing, if he doth not aide them, nor vse them as instruments, to do that which it pleaseth him to effect. Wherein we haue a most notable and profitable consideration, to behold God in all his creatures, to walke continually before him, and as it were from his hand to receiue all the successe, and diuers events, good or euill, which wee see every day happen and fall out in the world. From whence also we learne a most excellent consequence that he is the author and the first & principall cause of all the paynes and tribulations, that we endure. For it is he, who to correct and to force man to amendment of life, vseth his creatures, and all sorts of scourges when and where it pleaseth him, to the end that from that, which of it selfe is euill, he may draw a greater benefit. Therefore Esay speaketh in the person of God, saying, I am the Lord, and there is none other, I forme the light, & create darkenesse, I make peace and create euill. I the Lord doe all these things. Who, (sayth the Prophet in another place,) gaue Jacob for a spoyle, and Israel to the robbers, did not the Lord, because wee haue sinned against him? For they would not walke in his waies, neither bee obedient vnto his lawes? The Lord also speaketh by Jeremy, saying of the Iewes, Behold I will bring a plague vpon them, which they shall not bee able to scape, and though they cry vnto mee, I will not heare them. And in Amos, hee saith thus, Shall there bee euill in a city, and the Lord hath not done it? Wee reade also in Ecclesiastes, that prosperitie and aduersitie, life and death, pouerty and riches come of the Lord. Yet it is very true, that if our first parents had not sinned, wee should not haue found so many, so diuers and so strange kindes of calamities, as wee dayly see in the world, nor so many difficulties in our proceedings in this course of life, but the way therein would bee plaine, straight, and very easie, without mountaines, turnings, windings, mud or durt. We should neede no medicines, because we should not be subiect to any infirmities. But because that in Adam & Eua we haue all offended, and that all of vs are hurt and sicke, our wounds and diseases can not bee healed, but by bitter medicines and purgations. Vpon this subiect then wee must first note, that if God had promised to vse his children in this world, delicately, and to send them riches, honors, and great estates, exempted from common troubles, and humane miseries, wee should haue great occasion to doubt whether we were his children, if to the contrary, pouerty & base condition together with a multitude of troubles, crosses, & anguishes, should happen vnto vs. But seeing it is so, that besides the comon necessity of all men, subiect to the burthē of the punishment of sin, either temporall, or eternal, the H. Ghost hath often & cleerly foreshewed vnto vs, that the childre of God, are ordained & appointed to be afflicted, and to suffer persecution. That they weepe and mourne, while the world reioyceth. That they are elected, that for doing well, they should suffer wrong. That they shall be hated of all men, for the name of Iesus Christ, banished, and put to death by those, that wil thinke they do God good seruice. Then seeing these things happen to our selues, or to our brethren, or remembering that they hapned to those that were before vs. Following the steps which the Lord Iesus Christ, and his Apostles traced, they ought to be vnto vs as many signes and euident testimonies of our adoption and vocation. And to comfort our selues with these diuine sentences. That the Disciple is not aboue his Master, nor the seruant aboue his Lord. That it is enough for the Disciple to be as his Master. That to follow Christ, we must denie our selues, and beare our Crosse patiently. And lastly, That through many afflictions, wee must enter into the kingdome of heauen.

3. The example of Iesus Christs passion, is a meanes to strengthen vs in our tribulations, and to perswade vs that wee are children of God, and that we must constantly endure persecution.

Secondly, to confirme vs in the said doctrine of the holy Scriptures, this ought to serue vs which wee learne throughout the whole Ecclesiasticall histories, that all whatsoever the

the holy Ghost foreshewed, touching the condition of the children of God, is by experience found to be true in all ages: For it hath alwayes beene seene, that the most excellent servants of God, were most afflicted, as the Apostle notably reciteth, shewing the conjunction of faith, and patience in the ancient faithfull fathers, who were tried with all manner of afflictions; and whom he opposeth against Christians, as an example for them to follow. But specially he exhorteth them, to cast their eyes vpon Iesus Christ the Anthonr, and perfecter of faith, who being righteous, suffered the ignominious death of the crosse: dispising all dishonour and disgrace on earth, & now is set on the right hand of the throane of God his Father. As in truth the example of him onely may and ought to serue vs for all, seeing that specially wee must bee made conformable to his Image, (as Saint Paul saith,) and because hee is the first borne among many brethren. This Prince of glory entring into the world, (created and maintained by him,) found no honourable place to rest in, but was borne in a stable, and layde in a manger. Not long after the king of that country, sought for him to put him to death, which was the cause that he was carried out of his countrey, by the blessed Virgin Mary, to liue poorely like a stranger in Egypt, Being returned into Iudæa, hee liued till hee was thirty yeeres old, in a vile and abiect estate of a Carpenter. When hee began to exercise his charge of a Prophet, a King, and Priest, or Lawgiuer to the Church: After hee had fasted forty dayes, and forty nights, he was hungry, and had nothing in the desert to eate: there he was assailed and tempted by the Diuell with three powerfull assaults rehearsed in the Scriptures. Preaching the kingdom of God, hee liued of the maintenance which was giuen him, by certaine simple women that supplied his want, with their meanes and possessed nothing. Hee was often iniured and railed vpon by the greater number of the people, that called him glutton, drunkard, seducer of the people, and a Diuell. He was led vpon a high mountaine, from thence to be throwne downe headlong: betrayed by one of his Apostles, imprisoned, spit vpon, buffeted, beaten, mocked, whipt, crowned with thornes, condemned to dye, and hanged vpon the crosse between two theeues. But besides these exteriour torments, what anguish did hee feele in his heart, when he sayd, that his soule was heauy to the death, when hee fell vpon his face ont he ground, and when he cryed vpon the crosse (My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?) He that attentiuely will consider the life and death of this great Sauiour of the world, cannot but be greatly comforted in all his tribulations, and seeke to imitate the patience and meeknesse of Iesus Christ, who hauing no sinne, suffered and endured so much for vs. But specially and before all things, wee are by his example to learne, hat it shall be a great assurance vnto vs of our adoption, and to be heires of God, and coheires with Iesus Christ, when we suffer with him, (as the Apostle saith) to the end to be glorified with him: when (saith he elsewhere) we shall haue the honour to accomplish the rest of the afflictions of Christ in our flesh, that we may obtaine celestiall riches. For feeling in our selues a participation of his sufferings, euen vntill the last act of our liues, wee shall haue matter presently from thence to apprehend the power of the resurrection of the same Iesus Christ, with certaine and firme hope to enioy eternall glory with him.

But let vs a little consider, how feeble and weake, the occasions of our complaints are, touching those things which wee call the miseries of this life. Sickneses, pouertie, and losse of friends, commonly are three of the greatest crosses that wee complaine of. But that griefe which is not gotten by infirmity, and vaine opinion, is light, and may easily bee borne, if the patient will bee of a good courage, and say, This is nothing, or very little, it will soone passe away, or if it bee extreame, it is a sure meanes to obtaine perpetuall rest. As for pouertie, if wee looke into our nature, wee shall neuer bee poore, but wee if follow the opinions of men, wee shall neuer bee rich: For one contenteth himselfe with a little; another, the more hee hath the more hee desireth. But godlinesse is great gain if a man bee contented with that hee hath. Haue wee lost our goods? It may bee, they would haue beene our destruction, if wee had not lost them: wee shall from thence forward bee in lesse daunger; and wee are most happy, if wee haue altogether lost couetousnesse. Touching death, which taketh from vs our neere and best friends, it is in vaine to torment our selues therefore, when wee cannot remedie it. Wee wrong our selues to bee greeued for that which is happened to one, when the like may happen to all, in vaine is that complaint and desire where the thing desired (which is gladly and soone to follow our friends to the grave,) is so neere to him that wisheth it. To complaine for any mans death, is as much as to be sorry that he liued and was a man. Every mans life from the beginning to the end, is nothing else but a way and a disposition to death. Therefore we must rather giue thanks to God for the time that hee made vs enioy our friends on earth, then by a kinde of ingratitude towards them, and the diuine maiesty of God, to lament the ioy and the felicity which the passage by death out of this world into heauen bringeth them into.

4. The fruits of afflictions are of power to confirme the faithfull in the assurance of their adoption.

But here we must specially vnderstand, how afflictions by their fruites and effects may and ought with full assurance to confirme vs in our holy vocation in the Lord. For first, seeing the reliques of sinne remaine in this life, and that in those which are most perfect, which make vs all prompt and enclined to offend God, wee haue need of aide and releefe, to wake, to humble, and to withdraw vs from our corruptions and vices, specially to make vs carefull and wary not to fall into them againe, least they seate themselves in vs to our vtter destruction, but rather by degrees to forme and fashion vs, to a holy obedience vnto God.

To that ende are all the tribulations, wherewith God visiteth his children, and for that cause according to the doctrine of the holy Scriptures, they are called chastnings, corrections, and medicines for the soule, because they serue to withdraw our hearts from the world, to lift the vp to heauen, to purifie our faith as gold is purified by fire, to strengthen our hope of the glory to come, to teach and illuminate vs in the waies that may leade vs thither, and to conform vs to holinesse of life. Therefore the vtility and profite which we receiue, by this entertainment, which the flesh findeth to be of so euill a taste, ought to bee a certaine testimony vnto vs, that God in this manner plainly sheweth himselfe to be our father, and that so he hath a care of our good and saluation. Neuerthelesse, it is true, that there are but few men, (who while God visiteth, and chastneth them,) that receiue as they ought, the bitterness of this wholsom mirrh: but yet in the faithfull, tribulation alwaies produceth some fruit, and finally worketh this effect in their soules, that the mercy and sweetnes of the diuine hand of God, is by them acknowledged, in that it leadeth the elect by the bridle of Discipline, to eternall felicity. Then as the troubles and miseries of this life, call and mooue vs to feele our sins, to awake & humble vs before God, so fro thence in men truly touched with the feare of God, proceeds resolutions & protestations, no more by his grace to fall into the like faults, but to amend and become new men. Wherunto that which the Apostle saith, may be applyed, (that no chastning for the present seemeth to be ioyous, but grievous, but afterward it bringeth the quiet fruit of righteousness vnto them which are thereby exercised,) and that God chastneth vs for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holines. As David also to the same purpose protested, saying, Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I keepe thy word.

Heb. 10. 12. 11

Psal. 119. 67.

Againe, as terrestriall blessings, and commodities of this life, in their true endes and vses ought to bee meanes to eleuate our hearts to the Authour of all blessings, and Lord of all things, to acknowledge that wee receiue them from him, and to praise him for the same. To the contrarie, our corruptions and disordinate affections in the world, conuert them into thornes and hinderances of our duties towards God, and make vs presume, that they come from our selues, from our ancestors or parents, or that we haue gotten them by our owne vigilancy, care, and industry, and perswade vs, that wee our selues also can preserve and keepe them. Therefore G O D deprieth vs of such gifts, either by taking them away, or by mixing them with troubles and cares, that so wee should turne vnto him, to aske him that which wee neede, confesse our ingratitude, and acknowledge that we are beholding vnto him: for all that we haue for our benefit, necessitie, and vsc. As also, because that willingly wee esteeme too much of those inferior things, and make more account of them, then they deserue, louing them excessiue, & desiring and seeking to get them with great care and affection: God therein causeth vs to meet with thornes, and brambles, which withdraw vs from the foolish loue of those false riches, and teach vs to know that they are not true, to make vs seeke for the treasures of the Spirit, and thereby to be better disposed to follow our vocation. Experience too much sheweth that we are as it were linked to the riches and greatnes of the world, that they make vs proude and insolent, that we esteeme such vanities to be permanent, and that we thinke them happy that enioy them. We easily perswade our selues that great estates are firme, that their reuenues cannot diminish, nor their honor bee defaced, that the fauour and the amitie of mighty men will not alter nor change; that our health will not weaken, nor the strength of our youth decay, and to bee short, that the flourishing time of this miserable world will neuer whither nor fall away: withall making such account of our parents and friends, as if they were not mortall. And yet God depriueth vs of them all, when wee thinke least thereof, when wee make most account of these transitorie things, and when wee are perswaded that wee haue most assurance of them; or else, seasoneth them in such manner with the sharpe salt of tribulation, that they open our eies; to behold and perceiue the vanity of worldly pleasures, and to make vs confesse with David. That all flesh is grasse; and with the Apostle, that hauing no permanent city here, we must search for one to come. I wil stop thy way with thornes (saith God by his Prophet) To teach vs, that as beasts go along through the high way, & on the sides thereof see pleasant greene fields; thinking to go into them, and finding hedges full of thornes which pricke them, goe one their way, and leaue them: so when the children of God, goe out of the way of heauen, to enter into the pleasant fieldes of the world and the flesh, God makes them meet with brambles of afflictions, and scourgeth them with his paternall rodde; that by the bitter sweete prickles thereof, they should leaue and forsake the pernicious deceites of terrestriall and carnall affections, wherewith they feelethe selues assailed. When a mother desirous to weane her child, should continually say vnto it, (child, it is time for thee to leaue the breast, thou art great enough, I am with child, which spoyle my milke, and thou wilt bee sicke if thou suckest longer,) it were but in vaine, the child's eares being incapable of such admonitions, specially if it bee fond of the breast, and will not leaue it: But if the mother puts a little allume vpon it, when the childe feeles the breast bitter it will leaue it and sucke no more. So, though wee bee neuer so much warned and exhorted, to leaue the corrupt milke of the world and of the flesh, yet wee are too deafe to hearken therunto, and rather desire to ly still at the infected breasts of our mother nature, vntill God, (to weane and to regenerate vs, layeth the wormewood of afflictions vpon them. He doth like the good husbandman, which cutteth his vine, that it may bring forth more and better fruit. And as we cut birds wings, because they shall not fly away and be lost: so God cutteth our beautifull feathers of the flesh, that it may not grow too fat and full, and spoyle it selfe with vaine confidence and glory.

Psal. 103. 14.

Heb. 11. 14.

Olea 2. 6.

Ioh. 15. 1. 2.

Wee see how all things that serue for the vse of man, (to make them commodious and profitable for him,) endure many and diuers violences, as if it were as many tribulations and matterdomes the ground is broken vp, plowed and barrowed, to make it bring forth corne, which being reaped and gathered, is thrasht, fanned, ground, kneeded, and baked: wine is prest out of the grape: wooll and flaxe endure infinite labor, and goe through many mens hands to bring them to perfection; so man to serue God well, should bee refined like gold, and made perfect in the furnace of afflictions, that he may know how to vse the gifts and graces which he receiueth from God. So wee see, that whereas riches and honours of the world, make men insolent and proud: pouerty, and meane estate, imbaseth and humbleth them.

In bankets, feasts, and other assemblies of mirth and pastetime, wee speake of things that are pleasing and agreeable to the flesh, but at fasts, in sicknesse, when we lie on our deathbeds, and at the burials of our friendes; wee speake of life eternall, and of the means to attaine thereunto. And so in humane prosperity, we go diuers waies astray, and regard not the efficacy of spirituall instruction and admonitions: but in affliction, aduersity and griefe, we easily enter into the right way to heauen, and hearken to good counsell, veresifying the sentence, which is, that where vice aboundeth, aduersity beateth it down: and where vertue raigneth, it beautifieth, and maketh it euident to the world. For by nature we rely too much vpon terrestriall meanes, and know not what it is to beleue in God, (as Abraham did) beyond hope, with hope, and to trust in his providence without pawne in hand. Riches, estates, friendes, strength, health of body, support of men, as of the husband to the wife, of the father to the child and of the Prince to the subiect are as wayles staying our sight vpon earth and as stauers therein to leane vpon.

Rom. 8. 14.

And therefore God oftentimes taketh away those obstacles & feeble props of the flesh, to make vs feeble and perceiue the vanitie of our iudgements, and of all humane and mortall things: constraining vs by that meanes to cast pure eies on him, to cleaue vnto him, and wholly to depend on him. As Saint Paul saith, That he was brought into many and extreame perplexities, euen of death, that hee might haue no confidence, but onely in him, that is risen from the dead. God knowes when we haue neede to be mortified, and tried by temptations, (as Saint Peter saith) That the triall of our faith, being much more precious then gold that perisheth (though it bee tried with fire) might bee found vnto our praise, honour, and glorie, at the appearing of Iesus Christ. For as it happeneth to him, who sitting still at his ease, soone falleth asleepe, and hauing some thing in his hand letteth it fall, or it is easily taken from him: So the ease of the flesh, lul's vs asleepe in the world, and easily makes vs lose, and let fall out of our minds, the vertues and gifts of the holy Ghost. But when we are put into the furnace of tribulations, participating with the passions of Christ (as the Apostle saith) watching in faith, workes, and prayer; how loud soeuer the Diuell roareth, or vs with all the meanes hee can to bereaue vs of the graces of God, the firmer and constanter wee shall bee to withstand and resist him. For from thence, that excellent fruit of faith (to call vpon the name of the Lord) specially taketh force: For when we liue at our ease, and in great prosperitie, most commonly we pray but ordinarily or for fashion sake, but being oppressed with miseries, and assailed by diuers strong and humane troubles, the lesse reliefe and ease wee finde vpon earth, the more wee pray for and desire aide and helpe from heaven, and if we perceiue and feeble our selues ready to perish if God doth not strengthen, aide and deliver vs; then with all our hearts, and thoughts we crie vnto him, and protest that he is our Father, and our Saviour, and that all our hope and trust is in him: the feeling of our diseases makes vs goe to the Phisition. And David said to the people of Israel, That when God slew them, they sought him, and they returned and sought God earnestly. And they remembered that God was their strength, and the most high God their Redeemer.

Againe, patience, and all other Christian vertues are prooued and augmented by afflictions. For as a good Pilot of a Ship doth not shew his skill when the Sea is calme and peaceable, but when it is troublesome and tempestuous, and in time of danger, and as euery art hath rules and measures to direct, and effect the same: So the true leuell or lead to direct, sound, and examine our works, and to know how far we are gone, & haue aduanced our selues in the discipline of the Gospel, is patience, and constancie which we shew in our tribulations. And then by experience of the aide and assistance of God therein, our hope and the assurance and certainty of the diuine promise, which is, (That whosoever shall call vpon the name of the Lord shall bee saved) encreaseth. And as the Prophet saith, They that trust in the Lord, shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be remoued, but remaineth for ever. Which maketh Saint Iames exhort the faithfull to account it exceeding ioy, when they fall into temptations. Knowing that the triall of their faith, bringeth forth patience, and that if patience hath her effect, they shall be perfect and entire, lacking nothing. For when hee vs with sickness, necessities, & disgrace, or with any other humane calamities, then to feeble that he loveth vs, to find his corrections to bee good, to praise and thanke him, as we would doe a faithfull Phisition, and ioifully to submit our selues vnto his will, is a sacrifice of true obedience vnto him.

To conclude, the profitable fruits and effects of afflictions, are infinite to those that receiue them from the hand of God, and know how to vse them. For it is most true that tribulation is like a Fan, which purgeth and clenseth Corne; like a File which taketh rust from yron; like fire, which molifieth metall; like the pot which refineth gold; like salt which preserueth meat from putrefaction; like the heavenly hammer, which enlargeth our hearts, to make them more capable of diuine loue, like water which quencherh the fire of our concupiscence; like raine which watereth our soules, to make them more fertile; like winde which kindleth our charity, and like the bitter herbe Orpin which maketh vs leaue and forsake the im poisoned breastes of nature; and to bee short, it is the luerie of the children of God, and a certaine prooue, that wee are members of his Church. Therefore seeing wee are his by right of creation, and redemption; Let vs remember and learne, that for as much as he is our Creator, we ought in all things (how crosse and aduerse soeuer they bee) to practise, and say, Lord I held my peace, and opened not my mouth, because it was thou that hast done it. And because hee is our Redeemer, to assure our selues, that according to the loue which hee beareth vnto vs, and his infinite wisdom, hee will not dispose of vs (how bitter soeuer it seemeth vnto vs) otherwise then it shall seem good to him, for his glorie, and our saluation.

To that end the Apostle saith, that God chasteneth them whom he loueth, and scourgeth, euery son that he receiveth. And that if we endure chastening, God offereth himselfe vnto vs as to his sonnes, so saith Saint Iohn, and Salomon. And this doctrine is so certain, that when God will giue vs to vnderstand, that he is angry with any one, he saith, that hee will not correct him. As he saith by his Prophet, I will make my wrath towards thee to rest, and my lealousie shall depart from thee, I will cease and be no more angry, because thou hast not remembered the dayes of thy youth, but hast prouoked me with all these things. And I will not visit your daughters when they are harlots, nor your spoues when they are whores: as to the contrary he sayd to his people: You onely haue I knowne of all the families of the earth, therefore I will visite you for all your iniquities: Whereby wee evidently see and perceiue, that corrections, and rods of tribulation, are euident signes of the fatherly loue of God towards his children, who for their parts ought continually while they liue to say with the Prophet, Behold here I am, let God doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes, And with Iob, The Lord giueth, and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord for euermore, and to comfort themselves with the protestation of their trust & confidence in God, with David, saying: Though I walk in the midst of trouble, yet wilt thou reuine me, thou wilt stretch forth thy hand, vpon the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall saue me. But let vs note this, which is the crowne of all the fruits of tribulations, and a principall and speciall point whereunto we should referre all our actions, and our selues also: which is, that when God visiteth or correcteth vs with the one hand, he strengtheneth vs with the other, in the middle of the tempest of aduersitie. (and it is certaine, that it is a true effect of the comfort and consolation which hee giueth vs, and neuer denieth it to his children,) and more effectually sheweth his goodnes and power in our naturall infirmity, our miseries and troubles, beeing as it were scaffolds or open stages, whereon he maketh his glory shine, with all enlarging and encreasing ours. Therefore let vs say, that seeing afflictions are so fruitfull, that God is the author of them, and that they are laid vpon vs by his fatherly loue towards vs, and to shew the care he hath of our saluation: It followeth that in afflicting vs he sheweth himselfe vndoubtedly to be our Father. And as when we see carpenters, cut and hew peeces of wood to make them square and plaine, and Masons polish stones with their hammers: we thereby iudge that such peeces of wood and stones, are prepared by those workemen to bee employed in their buildings: so wee must beleue of our selues, that if God doth vse tribulation, as hatchets and hammers therewith to fashion and polish vs, as neede requireth, beeing naturally crooked, and full of knottes, vs fitte for good workmanship, it is a certaine testimony, that hee hath selected vs, to place vs in the building of his Temple, therein to bee liuing stones, edified for a spirituall house, and consequently that wee are his well beloued and blessed children.

5. To suffer for righteousness, is honourable, hauing a promise of present and future reward.

Further, wee ought carefully to meditate vpon a most great and weightie consideration, in the matter which wee intreat of, specially in this point, that God beeing most iust, neuer afflicteth nor punisheth vs vniustly. For although wee ought alwayes to confesse the same to bee true, thereby during our liues to humble and submit our selues vnder the corrections of our heavenly Father, and to giue him the honour that belongeth vnto him in all things: Neuerthelesse, he taketh not occasion necessarily for our sinnes to visite vs with tribulation; but oftentimes fauoureth his children so much, as that by his providence hee disposeth the cause and title of their afflictions to bee honourable, calling them persecutions and tribulations for righteousness, for the Gospell, for the name of Iesus Christ, and for the loue of God. Therefore such afflictions, to moue vs continually to liue in the feare of God in Christ, (as Saint Paul saith) are speciall giftes proceeding from his bountie, and loue towards vs, as the Apostle also saith to the Phillippians: For vnto you it is giuen for Christ, that not onely you should beleue in him, but also suffer for his sake. And our Lord saith, that they are blessed which suffer persecution for righteousness: for theirs is the kingdome of God. Then what can they lose, seeing that eternall inheritance belongeth vnto them, and cannot bee taken from them? And what an incomprehensible ioy and consolation is it for vs to know, that our persecutions heere on earth, doe assure vs of heaven, and makes vs fit and disposed to attaine thereunto? Further, wee must note, that Iesus Christ promisetht all manner of blessings and temporall rewards in this life to those which suffer persecution for righteousness sake, saying; Whosoever shall forsake houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or landes for my Names sake, hee shall receive an hundred fold more, and shall inherite everlasting life. For although these things doe not happen in the like nature, qualitie, and value of such goods and terrestriall commodities which wee forsake or lose, yet the contentment, quietnesse and ioy which the children of GOD feele, in what state soeuer they finde themselves to bee in the time of their tribulations and afflictions: for not consenting to euill, nor to that which is against the honor of God, are much more auailable to them, then if they had then recovered a hundred fathers for one, or an hundred times as many humane ayds, and possessions of inheritance; for that in their soules they haue the assured testimonie of the prouidence of God which conducteth all things, and of his grace and blessings, with peace of conscience. As also that experience hath alwayes made the faithfull feele, (and that in their greatest neede and extremities) the truth and effect of the aforesaid promise of temporall rewards, hauing found supplies in their wants, and many and oftentimes in greater aboundance, then they could by humane reason conceiue, and also by vnexpected meanes. As Saint Paul saith, That godlinesse is profitable vnto all things, which hath the promise of the life present, and of the life to come. And according to the sentence of the Lord: That if wee first seeke the kingdome of God, and his righteousness, all other things shall bee ministred vnto vs. But alwayes neuerthelesse, wee must specially eleuate our mindes and cogitations to the last and principall part of the said Text in the Gospell, which promisetht vs eternal life. For although God, to shew that pouertie and other afflictions happen not vnto his children for want of power in himself, to giue them riches, and to deliuer them out of aduersitie, oftentimes disposeth of things in such manner, that after they haue sustained great losse of goods and treasures, they haue greater abundance, and more ease and reliefe in this life: and yet notwithstanding we must be perswaded and beleue, that God will not haue vs to repose or settle our mindes vpon so weake and slender recompences, as to giue vs those goods and benefites, which are common to the wicked and infidels. For we reade, That the Apostles propoundeth vnto slaues, for their faithfull seruice, which they shall doe vnto their Masters, not the reward of terrestriall riches, but the inheritance of heaven.

Therefore the children of God should doe themselves great wrong, from so powerfull, rich, and liberall a Father, to expect terrestriall benefites, for a testimony of his beneuolence: and fleshly commodities, which passe and slide away like water; for blessing proceeding from his paternall hands. Hee will not haue his children and seruants to make account of such friuolous things, neither that they should beleue that therein consisteth any felicitie for them. A father which keepeth all his goods and possessions for his sonne, thinkes hee doeth very little for him, if hee should giue him the like Liuey that his seruants weare. And God will not recompence our bodies, for the seruice which our soules doe vnto him: but as hee is liberall and iust; so it pleaseth him to giue vnto the battailes and combates of the spirit, spirituall crownes, and will acknowledge our labours, not according to the basenesse of our hearts, but according to the dignitie of his greatnesse, because hee doeth not properly recompence our workes, but rather those which his Spirit worketh in vs. And who knoweth not the vanitie of all worldly things, and that a man cannot haue, nor receiue any contentment, but in celestiaall things? For it is true, that the enioying of any earthly thing whatsoever, alwayes giueth a man a new and vaine desire, by this, or in this, to get or obtaine that: But the soule being of an immortall essence, can neuer be satisfied nor contented with that which is transitory and mortall.

The onely tranquillitie of the Spirit, and peace of Conscience, which acknowledgeth from GOD the state of his condition, is the true blisse of man, his true riches, and whereof hee onely is worthy; that knowes how to despise all earthly things, and to bound all his desires in God, to say with Saint Augustine, Lord, if thou shouldest giue mee all that which thou hast created in the world, it would not suffice thy seruant, if thou giuest me not thy selfe. And againe, touching afflictions, Lord burne, and cut mee heere on earth, so thou wilt pardon me eternally: and so, he that suffereth any great tribulation, ought like one that is verie sicke which desireth to be healed, to put put all his state into the hands of that most wise and Soueraigne Physician of our bodies and soules.

6. Afflictions which passe lightly ouer, are recompenced with diuers celestiaall blessings, and at the last with eternall glory.

But specially, we must thinke vpon the notable sentence of Saint Paul (that our light affliction which is but for a moment, causeth vnto vs a farre more excellent and an eternall waight of glory, for it is true (as he saith before) that our outward man perisheth: as if he would say, that we lose our health, riches, honours, friends, fathers, wiues, children, and other commodities and helpes, seruing for this temporall life, yea and our liues also: But on the other side, (saith the Apostle) the inward man, (that is the spirit) is renewed, and dayly encreaseth. In the grace of regeneration, whereby also it fortifyeth it selfe in all vertue, by heavenly benediction, finally and abundantly to obtaine true eternall blessings. In such manner that although our bodies languish and are sicke, our soules are quickened and liue. It men bereaue vs of earthly riches, GOD presenteth vnto vs the kingdome of heaven. If wee be put from our estates and offices here in this worldly citie, Iesus Christ giueth vs greater in the celestiaall Citie, therein making vs kings, and sacrificators to GOD his Father. If we lose our fathers, the husband his wife, the wife her husband, and both of them their children and friends, God is alwayes for vs, and neuer forsaketh vs, and taketh not his spirit of consolation from vs, to make vs remember, and to consider, that hee which gaue them vnto vs, hath taken them from vs, and that being Lord of all men, and of all things, hee may without doing vs any wrong, dispose of his benefits according to his good will and pleasure, and to be brcefe, that wee haue greater occasion to praise and to thanke him for the time, that he lent vs those aides, meanes, and helpes in this life, then to complaine of this, that being his, hee hath taken them vnto him selfe, into the number of the blessed. If on the other side, the earth and that which is earthly, will no more sustaine nor suffer vs in this short and painfull pilgrimage: heaven to the which we trauell, draweth neere, and openeth it selfe to receiue vs into rest eternall. If worldly men banish and drive vs away, the angels of God, meet with vs, and auouch vs to bee their companions in glory: If men curse and speake euill of vs, they are words like to the winde, God in the meane time blesseth vs, conuerting the curses of our enemies into blessings, (as Dauid saith) If our carnall fathers disdaine vs, Iesus Christ the King of glory is not ashamed of vs, but auoucheth vs to bee his brethren, If they depriue vs of their inheritance, which is but earthly, God acknowledgeth vs to be his heire, and coheires with his sonne, in the Kingdome of heaven. If men constraîne vs to weepe with griefe and sorrow for transitorie and wauering things, Iesus Christ presenteth himselfe to wipe away our teares, and to conuert our sadness into perfect and perpetuall ioy. If wee bee banished out of our Countreys or from our Townes, God giueth vs the freedom of heaven in the supercelestiaall Ierusalem, which is made of pure gold, precious stones, and pearles, & whereof the Lord God almightie, and the Lambe are the Temple. And if the worst happen, if they put vs to death, it is our advancement to eternall felicitie, and it openeth vnto vs, the way instantly to enter into it.

Then as those that passe ouer a river which riseth high, and stormeth, trouble not themselves to looke vpon the currant of the water, lest their heades should turne, and so they might fall into some greater danger, but to the contrary lift vp their eyes to heaven, or else cast them downe on the firme land, to fortifie their hearts, and to put themselves in good hope. So we must doe all the time that our ship floteth beere in the middest of so many furious waters of humane tribulations, withdrawing the eyes of our thoughts from them, to fixe them vpward to heaven, which is the onely and perpetuall habitation of the liuing, where the ioy and glory which wee expect remayneth. And therefore wee ought specially to meditate vpon the comparison which the Apostle maketh in the place before rehearsed, betweene our light afflictions, and of small moment, and the permanent weight of glorie, of an infinite reward, which they produce. For so wee may boldly say, that our euils are short, seeing that our dayes passe away in a moment of time, and that the blessednesse of the life to come, is very long, because it continueth for ever. Our dayes (saith the Prophet) doe not passe aboute seuentie or eighty yeres, and that in men that are of strong complexion. And God speaking of the captiuitie of Babylon, which continued seuentie yeres, said; For a moment in mine anger, I hid my face from thee for a little season: calling that time of seuentie yeres, yeares, an instant, in regard of the permanent benefites, which hee would bestow vpon his Israel, as hee addeth in the wordes following, But with everlasting mercie haue I had compassion on thee.

1. Iohn 2. 18

And to the same purpose tendeth that in Saint Iohn, where hee calleth the time since the comming of Iesus Christ the last houre, as if he would deuide, all the time of the continuance of the world, into three or foure houres, whereof one was after the birth of our redeemer, vntill his last comming in glory, which last houre, hath already endured, 1618. yeeres, and yet it is not accomplished: wherein there is no great wonder, if wee can represent vnto our minds and vnderstandings, two eternities of times, to be considered of by all christians, the one was before the foundation of the world, and that is an infinite time: (If that may be called a time, which hath no beginning, and which swalloweth vp mans vnderstanding when he once thinketh how God was then all in all things, and all was in him) Then there shall be an other eternitie, after the ende and changing of this great earthly globe, when God shall be all in his elect, in the new heavens of celestiall Ierusalem, and that againe is an infinitie of time, altogether incomprehensible to the capacitie of humane sence.

Wherefore when wee consider the continuance of the world, betweene these two eternities, which already is five thousand yeares and vpwards; yea, let vs adde vnto it, once or twice as much time more, (although the common opinion is, that it shal not continue sixe thousand yeares) all that is not to bee accounted two or three houres in comparison of that which is to continue for euer; and shall bee found to bee lesse then a graine of sand, in regard of all the sand in the world; or then a drop of water, in comparison of all the water in the Seas. For in all these things which are created, there is number, weight, and measure: but in the eternitie there is no such thing; because in it there is nothing but infinitie.

Psal. 90. 4.

Which Saint Peter teacheth vs, saying, That before God, a thousand yeeres is as a day, and a day as a thousand yeeres with the Lord. And as Moses saith, That a thousand yeeres in his sight are as yesterday, when it is past, and as a watch in the night. But that which hindreth man from looking clearly into this notable meditation, to know and learne, that his troubles and euill time is but of small continuance, as well as his terrestriall dayes, and to comfort his soule with the certaine expectation of eternall beatitude, proceedeth specially from three things. The first is his naturall impatience, which depriueth him of this prooffe, and knowledge of the good will of God towards him: whereof the Apostle discourseth to the Romanes, and which is the cause that true hope neuer faileth, but alwayes hath an happy issue.

Rom. 5. 3.

Rom. 8. 23.

The second cause of our euill is, because nature leadeth vs vnto a beleeuing of nothing else but that which wee see or feele with our carnall senses, a thing altogether contrarie to faith, and the hope of saluation (as Saint Paul witnesseth.) The last is, that man is borne with so depraved a iudgement, (as Saint Chrysostome eloquently discourseth) that hee feareth that which he should not feare, and apprehendeth not that which is more to be doubted. He feareth humane miseries and afflictions, which are nothing (for they cannot separate him from the grace of God) but hee hath no feare of sinne, which maketh a diuision betweene God and vs, and which drawes and bring vpon vs all the euills which trouble and torment vs in the world. To conclude, every one complaineth much of the tribulations in this life, and yet the greatest part leaue it against their willes, and haue more affection thereunto then to life eternall. Then what would they doe, if this terrestriall habitation had by God bin permitted to be altogether peaceable, pleasant and delightfull? Who would haue cared for the kingdome of heauen? or who would with all his heart and affection haue aspired to that glorious immortalitie?

7. The conclusion of this Chapter.

To conclude this proposition, seeing wee ought alwayes to hold for a most assured truth, that God our Father governeth and moderateth all things in the world generally, and particularly to that end and purpose which it pleaseth him by his most wise providence and soueraigne loue, to ordaine and appoint with a singular care of men, but specially of his elect. Wee must from thence drawe this certaine doctrine, that the same God is the Authour of all humane afflictions, which hee disposeth in such manner, that from thence hee knowes how to draw great benefites, as hee doth from all the other euils which happen to man, by their meanes discovering the treasures of his glorie: That his paternall loue is such,

such, that hee not onely cherisheth his children, provideth for them, and defendeth and counselleth them; but also reproveth, chasteneth, and visiteth them with his rods of discipline, that wee may bee participants of the great fruits of eternall saluation: That wee might acknowledge the vanity of the ordinary discourses of the flesh, touching that intertainment, which it findeth to bee so hard and harsh in tribulations, and fortifie our mindes therein with the notable meditations of the spirit, which are drawne out of the holy Scriptures, for the comfort and consolation of the faithfull, and that experience ought to teach vs, that our enemy the flesh nourisheth and intertaineth it selfe with sweet and delicate things; as to the contrary, the soule feedeth on hard and bitter meate, that the one quickeneth by roughnesse and aduersitie, the other decayeth by vaine pleasures and delights: the one maketh it selfe stronger and of more force by bitter and vnflauory things; the other weakeneth it selfe by sweet and pleasing things: and as hard and seuerer things afflict the flesh; so soft and delicate things destroy the spirit: in such maner, that the same which for a little time maketh the one liue at her ease, killeth and murdereth the other eternally. Let vs proceed further in the doctrine of the holy Spirit, and comfort our selues in this point: That affliction in the house of the Iust, is a secret mercie of God; and prosperitie to the wicked and peruerse, a certaine signe of diuine indignation: remembring also the prayer of the Prophet, that with him wee may often say, Lord teach vs so to number our dayes, that we may apply our hearts vnto wisdom. For from thence wee learne, that as seuentie or eightie yeares, which Moses assigneth to be the longest time of the life of men, are but as a minute of an houre, to the vnderstanding faithfull man, that knoweth how to compare them to the eternitie which wee hope for: and so it is with the longest time of our tribulations. Againe there is no man liuing, which passeth all the course and dayes of his life in payne, and trouble, that feeleth not many comforts and eases in his afflictions; and if it be but only when he sleepeth.

Psal. 90. 12

Then whereof doe wee complaine? we should rather reioyce in that which we heard before of the Apostle, That a moment of light aduersitie, produceth an eternall weight of glory: which should moue vs to pray vnto God, to beseech him of his diuine grace, so to reforme our nature, that wee may become conformable in our wills, to his most good and iust will; to the end, that in the rugged and difficult way, in the which it pleaseth him to conduct vs in this pilgrimage full of teares, wee may alwayes goe on cheerefully and contentedly, seeking to doe his will, and not our owne. For in that manner proceeding in our course of life, beeing sustained by his Spirit, and strengthened by his consolation, in all estates whatsoever, the peace and ioy of our adoption in Christ shall alwayes remaine firmly in our hearts, with patience to attend the great day of the comming of our Lord and Saviour Iesus Christ, when hee will gather together the children of God his Father, in the Kingdome of heauen, there to crowne them with honour, there to clothe them with gladnesse, there to fill and satisfie them with the sweetnesse of his delights, there to exalt them with his exaltation; and there to make them participants of his eternall felicitie in all fulnesse.

The sixth consolation for a Christian Phylosopher is, constantly to perseuere in his vocation to the Lord, not to feare death, to walke in the wayes of God, and continually to pray vnto him.

Chapter 6.

1. In Christian hope which is not visible, it is requisite to haue singular patience and perseuerance.

Iesus Christ which is the true light, illuminating and quickning all men, when hee had vanquished and overcome death, gaue light vnto the world by his Gospel, to bring life vnto light (as the Apostle witnesseth.) And therefore the Scripture saith, Hee that heareth my word and beleueth him that sent mee, hath euertlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but hath passed from death vnto life. And we are no more strangers, nor forrainers, but Citizens with the Saints, and of the household of God, who hath made vs sit together in the heauenly places, in Iesus Christ. In such manner that wee want nothing that tendeth to perfect felicitie:

licitie. But because wee must be exercised, and learne to fight heere vpon earth, and that with hard and difficult conditions, as if wee sawe no fruits of the victorie which Christ hath obtained for vs, to fortifie and strengthen vs in this combate, wee must remember that which is taught vs in the Word of God, touching the nature of hope. For seeing we hope for that which we see not, and that faith is an euidence of things which are not seene: It followeth, That while wee remaine in this prison of the body, wee are in a manner absent from God, and travellers in this world, (as the Apostle saith.) For which cause also, he saith in another place, That wee are dead, and that our life is hid in God with Iesus Christ: and that when Christ, which is our life, shall appeare, then shall wee also appeare with him in glory. This in effect is the manner of our condition, which is, that liuing soberly, righteously, and godly in this world, wee should looke for that blessed hope, and appearing of that glory of that mighty God, and of Saviour Iesus Christ. Wherein we haue need of singular patience, to keep vs from being wearie in our course of life, and from turning awry, or leaving the place assigned & appointed vnto vs. Know yee not (saith S. Paul) that they which runne in a race, runne all, yet one receiveth the price: so runne that yee may obtaine. For we runne not vncertainly, but with assurance to obtaine the price of our saluation, although many runne better then wee. It is sufficient for vs constantly to follow on our course to the end, and according to the measure of grace which God hath bestowed vpon vs. We fight not doubtfully, or as if wee beate winde in the ayre, but wee fight the good combate of faith, being well assured of the victory, and thereby of a crowne (not of leaues, which wither within two or three dayes; but of an incorruptible crowne which lasteth for euer.) It is sufficient for vs to forget things past, for things to come, and to follow hard towards the marke, for the price of the high calling of God in Iesus Christ. And although the world shall waxe worse, iniquitie increase, and the loue of many shall be cold; we know well, that hee that endureth to the end, shall be saved. It is God himselfe which giueth this grace of perseuerance to the elect, and which alwayes confirmeth them therein, that they may be blamelesse in the day of our Lord Iesus Christ. God is faithfull, by whom wee are called vnto the fellowship of his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord. And therefore he maketh them participants of all his treasures, yea, and of himselfe, as much as shall suffice them here on earth, and fully in the life to come.

2. Of Death, and how pleasing and welcome it is vnto the faithfull.

Then at the end of the race, and after we shall haue fought a good fight, if we meete with death, before we receive and obtaine the price and renowne of glory, which wee hope for and expect, It may be our naturall senses will be moued and astonished thereat, when our body and soule must leaue one the other, which are so strictly and so admirably ioyned together. But it is a thing altogether intolerable, that there should be so small light in a Christian heart, as not to be able to triumph with a strong consolation, and firme resolution, ouer feare, in that last humane worke. For in truth death is nothing else, but the hower, to lay holde vpon the price of our earthly course, or rather the day of our victory, after along time of warre.

It is nothing else but the birth of a blessed soule after a great travell: the desired gate after we haue escaped the dangers of many furious tempests, the pleasing issue, or end of a perillous and painefull viage, The deliverance from all feare and trouble, the certaine accomplishing of our Sanctification, the gate of heauen, the entery into Paradise, our wedding day with the lamb, the taking of possession of the inheritance of our heavenly father, and the fulfilling of our desires. And if death wherewith God threatned our first parents, is a feeling of the wrath of God, both in body and soule, by reason of sin; in that respect we may wel say, that death and humane life are twins, and by nature so vnited together, that there is nothing but the separation of the soule from the body, which bringeth a new and a better quality to man, in such maner, that the changing of his visible essence, which we commonly call death to the faithfull, is rather a mortal blow giue vnto death: for that as the their bodies are wholly exempted from dolour and griefe, and their soules, from vice and corruption, slaying till the rest of death, (which is the wages of sin) shall be swallowed vp in the day of the resurrection. But that which deceiueth vs, is, that both life & death weare false masks to beguile man: for life, the seruant of sinne, euill fauoured, and alwayes accompanied with innumerable miseries and calamities, weares a faire and beautifull maske, which makes men desire and wish for it. And death (which freeth men from sin) beng faire, happy, and to be desired, hath an euill euill fauoured and a fearefull maske, which make men shunne and fly away from it. But let vs pull of these two maskes, and we will soone change opinion, finding vnder the faire maske of life nothing but matter of sadnesse and dislike; and vnder the vaile of death, so great beauty and felicitie, that we will presently become inamoured therewith, in such manner, that with the Apostle wee will say, Alas, wretched man that I am, who shall deliuer mee from this body of death? And againe with the same Apostle, let vs apprehend what good commeth vnto vs by death, and say, I desire to bee lofed, and to bee with Christ. For all the time that wee liue, wee haue diuers enemies which continually and cruelly assaile vs, and neuer cease making warre against vs, as the world with his affections, which wee cannot mortifie vnlesse we our selues die. Secondly, sinne which lieth in vs, and fighteth most dangerously with vs, vntill such time as we die, and then it leaues vs: and lastly Sathan, whose continuall assaults neuer cease, but only by death. And Iesus Christ dying once, destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the deuill: and hauing in his owne body vanquished him, daily triumpheth ouer him in his members: In such sort, that wee haue that great Saviour of the world, not onely a spectator of our combates, but also an assistant, and an aider of vs, that with the Apostle wee may say, Oh death where is thy sting? oh graue where is thy victorie? But thanks bee vnto God, which hath giuen vs victory through our Lord Iesus Christ: Which is as much to say, that wee find nothing more easie vnto vs, then peaceably to end the course of our liues, when the hower which God hath thereunto appointed, shall come. The poore labouring man is glad, when he hath made an end of his dayes worke: death is alwayes sweet vnto those that sigh and groane vnder the burden of sinne, and humane tribulations. The memory thereof is bitter onely to those who willingly are luld asleepe in the pleasures of the flesh, and that put their trustes in worldly vanities: For what traveller is not glad and reioyceth, when he drawes neere to his owne Country, after hee hath past ouer and through many dangers? Heauen is our country, and the earth to vs, is like a dangerous passage in a forraine countrey, or to terme it better (as it is accursed vnto vs for our sinnes) a right banishment. Then if by death wee are repealed out of a miserable exile, to dwell in our countrey, which is celestially, haue wee not great cause therein, to receiue singular comfort and consolation? And if the leauing of this world by death, is an entrance into life, what is the earth, but onely a sepulchre, and to dwell in the world, but onely to be plunged headlong into death? Again, what is he which will not be content and very well pleased, to goe out of a fraile and weake house, ready to decay? This tabernacle of our body is weake, corruptible, and tending to rottennesse, and must be dissolued, and as it were wholly consumed, that it may one day be restored to a better estate, firme, incorruptible, and celestially: The world which sustaineth it, is altogether euill (as Saint Iohn saith) and we daily see it corrupt and approaching to the ende, giuing no commoditie nor pleasure to man, but hee must buy it dearly, and makes him alwayes feeble varietie of crosses, wherein sometimes hee is wounded by enuie, and many times by ambition, or some other vice, besides the vnexpected assaults, which many diseases of the body giue vnto him, and a great number of griefes to the soule.

Wherefore there is no other meanes for vs in this combat, to overcome all the impreachments of the tranquillity & peace of our soules, then that which is taught vs by the Apostle, which is, in such sort to dispise all earthly things, whose glory is confusion, that our conuersation hereon earth, may be as if we were in heauen, both in thought & affection: with peace & spirituall ioy euery day attending, the desired death of our bodies, in most blessed hope of the resurrection thereof to life eternal. And certainly whosoever doth otherwise, and apprehendeth our departure out of the world to heauen, as if it were some great hurt or euill vnto vs, evidently sheweth, that he hath reaped small profit in the Schoole of Christ, for it is the part of those, that desire not to goe vnto him. To feare death, or to be loath to leaue the world, and as much as if they had not any will to raigne with him. And in a word, to preferre the miserable estate of a prison, before the liberty of a free life full of all blessed and heavenly ioy. Again, why should we feare that way or passage which euery man must goe, and whereunto we cannot attaine, but onely by the will of him, that hath giuen vs life, to leaue it again at the houre and time which he hath appointed? Lord (saith David) my times (euery moment of my life) are in thy hand? The Lord killeth and maketh aliue, bringeth downe to the graue, and raised vp. And al the haire of our heads are numbered. Who knoweth not that there is no creature more enemy to the faithfull nor puissant to hurt him, then the Diuell? And in the Scripture he is called the enemy, a murderer, and a roaring Lion, alwayes seeking whom he may deuoure. But hee hath so little power to aduance or further our deaths, or to doe vs any harme, because God himselfe holdeth him as it were with a bridle, that he cannot attempt the least things, nor step a foot forward to hurt vs, vntill God by his prouidence suffereth him, as the history of Iob clearly sheweth vnto vs. He hath not so much power as to enter into hogs, without Iesus Christ gives him leaue: Then shall we feare men? who are all vnder the hand, power, & gouernment of God. It is he (saith the Prophet) which establiseth their enterprises in such sort, that they shall not exceed the weight of an ounce above his ordinance. All whatsoever they doe, it is by the will & power of God that created them; and all that they doe is for him, and for his seruice, and our good, to the end, that as it pleaseth him (and alwayes iustly) they should be as fire to purifie vs, rods to correct vs, medicines to heale vs, bridges to passe ouer from the deserts of the world into the land flowing with all heavenly benefites, ladders to helpe vs to ascend vp into heauen, instruments to glorifie vs, and as the knife, cutting the cords which retaine and hold vs fast in this prison of the body, and withhold vs from going to God in his kingdome, with our Redeemer Iesus Christ. To be short, it is the most, and all powerful God our Father, which hath disposeth of all things in his glory to make vs happy, in such manner, that there is nothing that can alter or change his will and decree, neither withstand nor make any thing that happeneth vnto vs, either in life or death, not to serue for a helpe, and as it were a way, to bring vs to our soueraignetelicitie, which is, to inioy the sight of God.

Cant. 5.3.

2 Cor. 7.1.

Phil. 2.12,

After the discourse of so many notable doctrines drawn from the holy Scriptures, wee may well say with Saint Paul, But I passe not at all, neither is my life deare vnto my selfe, so that I may fulfill my course with ioy, in the administration which I haue receiued of the Lord Iesus. Which to doe, it is conuenient for vs, in all things to exercise that which God hath ordained, to nourish in vs godlinesse, faith, loue, humilitie, patience, hope, perseuerance, and all other gifts and graces giuen vnto vs (which proceed of his bountie) by the which it hath pleased him to elect and to adopt vs to himselfe in Iesus Christ our Sauour; which are so many meanes ordained by his prouidence, to make vs to obtaine eternall life. Whereunto serueth (as it is declared in the first part of our Philosophy) the often reading, and meditating of the word of God, to instruct and to teach our families to do the same, often to be present, and to perseuerat the preaching of the word in the holy church, there to confesse and to cal vpon the name of God, and to communicate the Sacraments. The profession of Christians is a doctrine giuen from heauen, not to tumble or tosse it vp and downe in our mindes, but to seat it in our hearts, neither yet to haue it at our tongues ends, only to speake thereof, but to spread it selfe throughout all the parts of our liues, with the efficacy of good works. We must (saith Saint James) bee doers of the word, and not hearers onely, deceiuing our owne selues. God hath adopted vs to bee his children, but vpon condition, that the image of Christ should shine in vs. He hath chosen vs to bee his temple, but his temple is holy, and his spirit dwelleth therein. He hath redeemed vs with a price; but it is to the end that he might bee glorified in our bodies and in our soules, which belong vnto him. He hath freed vs from sinne by Christ, but to be seruants to righteousness. He hath giuen vs his well beloued Sonne for our iustification, but to the end also that he should be our sanctification. He would haue him die for all men, but to make vs to liue to him that died and rose againe to obtaine eternall life for vs. Therefore let vs remember that which the faithfull spouse saith, I haue washed my feet, how shal I defile them? And that which the Apostle teacheth vs: saying, Seeing then that wee haue these promises, let vs cleanse our selues from all filthinesse of the flesh and spirit, and finish our sanctification in the feare of God. As the conditions and bonds betweene him and vs, is holy. But as it is God which worketh in vs, both the will and the deed, even of his good pleasure, let vs onely resigne our selues ouer vnto him, earnestly and continually beseeching him to accomplish the end of our vocation to his glory, prayer is the soule of our soules, it quickneth all our affections & works. For without the grace of God, which we obtaine by praier, all whatsoever we thinke or doe, is vanity. Faith, is the key which openeth the coffers of Gods treasures; but praier is the hand wherewith we draw out those treasures, to enrich our selues withall. It lifteth our hearts from the earth vp to heauen, it refresheth our memory with the promises of Christ, to confirme vs therein, it assureth vs against all feares, it obtaineth all whatsoever wee desire, it giueth peace and contentment to our soules soules, it keepeth and encreaseth our minds in the feare of God, it augmenteth our affection to be ioyned with him in Christ, whereon consisteth our soueraigne good, it begetteth in our hearts a dispising of the world, and a defiance of the works of the flesh, it presenteth vnto, and maketh our soules feeble the eternall and celestially goodnes of God.

And to be short, praier, by the which we honour God, maketh him continue his good will towards vs. There is nothing more to be desired then to conuerse with him that is our ioy & consolation, and without whom we cannot liue happily nor contentedly. God is he that giueth vs happines & contentment, whersoever he is, there is Paradise, and where he is not there is hell; then he that wil alwaies be conuersant with God, either, let him pray, or reade his word according to S. Augustines counsel, For when we pray we speak to God, and when we reade the holy Scriptures, he speaketh vnto vs, and the more we exercise both the one, and the other, we aduance our selues in piety. Therefore we must not leaue off, nor bee discouraged in our praiers, although the Lord hearing vs, oftentimes deferreth vs from feeling the fruit of our requests, and giueth vs more then we aske at his hands. For as we haue said in another place, we owe him this honor to remit and refer our selues vnto his wisdom, as touching the time to receiue that for the which wee pray vnto him, and as concerning the maner to be heard and succoured by his bountifull mercy.

It should suffice vs, that he maketh vs this promise (and he cannot lie) That whatsoeuer we shal aske the Father in his name, it shall be giuen vs. And if he delaierh the accomplishing thereof, it is for our great good. Let hope the daughter of faith, in the meane time nourish her mother, and fortifie her constantly to attend vntill such time as the Lord shall incline her eares vnto vs, and make vs to feeble the full effect of his promises, which are alwaies certain and infallible. Zacharias & Elizabeth thought they had praied in vaine, when in their youthfull daies they asked children of the Lord, yet when they were old, and out of hope of any children, the angel of the Lord said vnto Zacharias: (thy prayer is hard) not that which he then made, for he thought no more vpon hauing children but that which he had made vnto God, long time before. And also because God oftentimes heareth vs, not according to our wils, but for our profits; it hapneth sometimes, that in mercy he refuseth that vnto his childre, which in his anger he grāteth to strāgers & peruerse people. As when we aske of God things concerning this life, as health, benefites, dignities, riches, parents, friends, and lands: & God deprining vs of all that, giueth vs spirituall graces, wherein we shall feeble much more profit, ioy, & contentment by his prouidence in the want that wee haue of his terrestriall benefites, ordaining the means to encrease & augment our glory in the kingdome of heaven. Then let vs learne that when wee feeble a slackenes and sluggishnes in our duty of praier, & when we haue scarce begun to pray, that in stead of thinking vpon God, & that which we aske of him, our mindes are carried an other way, they are testimonies of our corruption and infirmitie, whereinto Sathan thrusteth himselfe to trouble vs, & to put vs in a distrust of his heavenly grace. Whereof S. Chrysostom eloquently sheweth the cause, and consequently the remedy: saying, how comes it to passe, that when we speake of warre, of marchandise, and of other worldly matters, we discourse and argue long time without thinking vpon any other things; and presently when we pray vnto God, our mindes wauer, and goe astray? Learne this Christian (said he) it is because the diuel knoweth well, that speaking of earthly matters, thou dost him no hurt, and therefore hee suffreth thee to discourse as long as thou wilt. But when he seeth thee kneele down, to pray vnto God, he knoweth that thou goest about to procure that which he hateth, and which tendeth to the destruction of his kingdome. And therefore he thrusteth himselfe in between both, troubling, and drawing thy thoughts an other way, to hinder the fruits of thy prayers.

Then say to Sathan, who at that time is so neere vnto thee: Away from me, thou tempter, for I must pray vnto my God, and when thou feelest him importunate with thee, beseech God to drine him away from thee, & so perseuere in thy prayer. Now for that it may so fall out, that by meanes of some great affliction of the body, or of the soule, some man may bee so feeble, that he cannot make any formall prayer with tongue and voice, hee ought not therefore to be discouraged. For at the least, he hath power to desire his own good and saluation. There is no sicknes, no nor any terrant, that can hinder or impeach him from that. The mind and desire is a praier before God, he heareth saith Dauid the desire of the humble and poore, hee prepareth their hearts, and bendeth his eares vnto them. Therefore let vs alwaies say with him, and when wee cannot say it, let vs meditate in our thoughts (Lord I powre my whole desire before thee, and my sighing is not hidde from thee; thee. It is written of Ezechias King of Iuda, That in his affliction, he could not distinctly pray vnto God, but chattered like a Crane, or a swallow, or grumbled like a dove; yet lifting his eyes vp to heauen, his prayer was heard. What prayers doth the little child make to the mother? it weepeth and cryeth, and she giues it the brest, or giueth him some other thing, which she thinketh he needeth. Much more and sooner will our heauenly Father that vnderstandeth the sighs, the sobs, and the wishes of his children, doe the office of a good Father towards them, providing them of all things necessary.

Then to conclude, let vs learne to make our vocation sure vnto the Lord, by walking in his waies, and aspiring vnto future immortality. Let vs march ioyfull in our race to come to death, not as if we would be vnclathed, but because we desire to be better clothed. Brute beasts and insensible creatures, hauing as it were a certaine feeling of their vanity and corruption, harken after the latter day, to be deliuered from it: much more the, (In consideration of all that concerneth our happines,) ought we to lift vp our affections & thoughts aboue all earthly and mortall things, let vs aske of God those graces, which are necessary for vs: And if we receiue them not when we would, but when, & in such measure, as it pleaseth him, let vs know that his will is to giue vs to vnderstand and will haue vs earnestly to meditate, that they are his gifts, which, when he deferreth, it is to humble vs the more, by the feeling of our imperfections and weakenes, so to prooue our patience & perseuerance. Therefore let vs not be discouraged, but let vs perseuere at all times to pray vnto God, following the example of the wise widow, who being continually in the Temple, night & day serued the Lord in praier and fastings, assuring our selues, that as he whom we call vpon, desireth our good & according to his paternal loue & infinit power, can giue vs that which weaske of him, and according to the truth of his promise, he will heare vs: so according to his wisdom, he knowes the fit time, and the conuenient means, to make vs feeble & find the effect of our praier. If we pray vnto him with such a zeale, and with the feeling of the ardency and faith which is required in true praier, let vs remember, that it is in the name of Christ that we pray vnto God, according to his word, that for the loue of him he will heare vs, and not for the excellency and worthines of our praier. Let vs carefully remember and meditate, that it is by the mouth of the sonne, that euery faithfull Christian presenteth his prayers to the Father, to be sanctified in him who is his wel beloued Son in whom he is wel pleased, which therefore cannot but be pleasing and agreeable vnto him. Let vs beleue, that what weaknes or coldnes soeuer we feeble in our selues, neuerthelesse, we are bound to pray; and to continue in that duty towards God, and withall to acknowledge our infirmity in this holy worke, in such manner, that praying we may aske double pardon and forgiveness of God, that is of our sinnes before committed, and of that which we commit in praying negligently. By that meanes God of his goodnes bearing with our want in praier, will receiue it as a sweet smelling savor, and as an incense offered vnto him by our great sacrificatour Iesus Christ, and will make vs perceiue the fruits thereof, vntill our ioy shall be accomplished.

Meditations and Prayers, which a Christian Philosopher, for a seuenth and a compleate consolation ought to haue in heart and mouth, and every day to exercise the same, to liue and die happily. Chapter 7.

1. Meditation vpon the Lords Prayer.

All the precepts in the holy Scriptures, are no other thing, but commandements of God our Lord and Father, touching the obedience which he requireth of vs, foundations wheron to build our hope, instructions to strengthen our faith, food to nourish our soules, guides to conduct vs in the way, & helps to comfort vs in the miseries thereof, & to bring vs to saluation. In such maner, that when the heart of the faithful becometh tractable here on earth, vnto those sacred precepts, it is a most assured means to bring him to heauen. Among so many good instructions that are found to bee in the holy Scriptures, Iesus Christ

Christ hath specially appointed vs a forme to pray well vnto God. Hee, I say, which is the wisdome of the Father, which hath the words of life, and by whom we live, and shall live, hath taught vs what wee should aske of God, to the ende, that praying as his Sonne hath taught vs, he would the willinglier hearken to vs, and wee shall bee so much the more assured that he will heare vs. This Sauour of the world had taught, That the houre should come, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in Spirit and truth. And therefore to accomplish his word, hee hath giuen vs his Spirit, by the which wee crie, Abba Father. And hath pronounced his word, for a certaine testimonie of the Gospel, to make vs to yeelde vnto God that spirituall seruice, which is conuenient to his nature, saying, When you pray, say thus, Our Father which art in heauen, hallowed bee thy Name, &c.

John 4.23.

Rom. 8.14.

John 4.24.

Math. 6.9.

Luke 11.2.

Here in the first place wee see, how Iesus Christ, the Doctor of peace, and the Master of vnion and concord, would haue our prayer to be publike, and common to all Christians, as all the people of God are but one body. For as in one man (the word made flesh) God faued many, and that by one eternall Spirit hee governeth all his elect; so hee would, that when one man alone prayeth, hee should pray for all, saying, Our Father which art in heauen, &c. Oh happie and amiable beginning of Prayer, wherein man newly regenerated, and which is reconciled vnto God, calleth and claimeth him to be his Father, because hee is receiued to be a child, and one of his heavenly family, hauing bin baptized, and beleeuing in the name of Christ, the first borne among many brethren: It is true, that God our Father is in heauen, but this is it which comforteth vs, that he is our Father, that wee are his, and that hee accepteth of vs in his beloued Sonne, in whom he hath elected, called, and sanctified vs, to bee glorified. Then for the first request we pray, and say, Hallowed bee thy Name: that is in vs, that his glory may bee exalted in our soules, in all places, and in all things, whereby also wee obtaine that holinesse, which is conuenient for his children, and wherof wee are aduertised in Baptisme, to the end that wee should perseuere therein. For in trueth, the name of God and his word are not sanctified and honoured by vs, if wee our selues bee not holy in all our conuersation.

Rom. 8.24.

Rom. 8.29.

1. Pet. 1.15.

Secondly, wee say, Thy kingdome come: that is, in respect of vs, in such manner, that wee that haue bin seruants to sinne, the world, and the deuill, from henceforth might haue Iesus Christ puiſſantly reigning in vs, and that God will daily increase the number of the faithful, vntil the accomplishing of his kingdome at the latter day. For then the kingdome of God shalbe perfect, when wee heare his sweet voice, saying, Come ye blessed of my Father, take the inheritance of the kingdome prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Thirdly, we aske of God, and say, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heauen: that is to say, that we may willingly and obediently in faith doe that which is pleasing and acceptable vnto him. Wherein wee must be assisted by God himselfe against the impeachments of Sathan, & against the which no man can be assured, but by a speciall diuine grace. So then, as God is eternal; so whosoever will be happy for ever, he is bound to doe the will of the eternall God: that is, the same which Christ teacheth vs in the Gospel, as the Angels doe the commandement of God in heauen; obeying the voice of his word. After these threerequests, which properly concerne the glory of God, we make three more vnto him, wholly concerning our selues, and for our good & benefit: albeit, that by his infinite goodnes, he doth in such manner dispose and ordaine all things, that nothing can be for the honour of his name, which also is not good for our saluation; so in all our demands, which specially concerne vs, his glory ought to bee so much respected, that it should be the end and purpose of our desires. The first of the three last requestes is, Giue vs this day our daily bread: which may bee vnderstood spirituall by Christ, which is the bread of life, & the necessary food of our soules. But here the Lord specially teacheth vs, not to be transported, nor otherwise carried away then we shoud be, by the cares of this present life, but rather as we brought nothing into the world, and that wee shall carry nothing out of it againe, we should also content our selues with that which sufficeth vs to liue soberly, and to clothe our selues simply; it beeing most true, that they which aspire to riches and superfluities, fall into many griefes, and are easily caught in the snares of the deuill. Then contenting our selues to aske of God our daily bread, we shall not be carefull for to morrow, nor to aske of God our Father greater things for this life: for the next day shall care for it selfe, and he that provideth for the fowles of the heauen, which neither sow nor reape, nor carry into the barnes, and which clotheth the grasse of the field; knowes well, how to furnish vs with all that which shall be necessary for vs.

1. Tim. 6.8.

Mat. 26.26.

Math. 6.12. Then it followeth, And forgive vs our trespasses, as wee forgive them that trespass against vs. Heere wee aske forgiveness of sinnes which are called Trespasses, because they hold vs bound to the condemnation of eternall death. Which wee beseech G O D our Creator, that he would be pleased freely and graciously to pardon. For it is the onely meanes whereby wee are pleasing and agreeable vnto him, as if wee were righteous and innocent, and which assure our consciences of his fatherly loue towards vs, from whence we haue saluation and life eternall. But the condition opposed to this request, bindeth vs before God to forgive our neighbours, if wee will haue him to forgive vs, as Iesus Christ saith in another place, That with such measure as wee mete, it shall bee measured vnto vs againe. And that if wee forgive not our brethren with all our hearts, wee shall bee dealt withall, as the euill seruant was, which dealt rigorously with his fellow seruant. It is a good sacrifice which wee present to our common father, when our hearts are reconciled and vnited together with all his family: otherwise, our Prayer cannot bee pleasing vnto him; for nothing pleaseth him, which proceedeth from a peruerse and a hatefull heart.

Math. 7.2. Math. 18.35. Lastly, wee say, And leade vs not into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill. For as God by his mercie preserueth his faithfull children, and suffereth not the Diuill (the authour of all temptations) to seduce them, nor will not haue sinne to ouerwhelme them: so those whom God in his iustice will punish, hee doeth not onely forsake them, and withdraweth his grace from them, but forthwith deliuereth them to the Diuill, to bee subiect to his tyranny, and blinding them, giueth them a reprobate sence. From whence we learne, for our singular consolation, that this great aduersarie can doe nothing against vs, but by the will and permission of God: who sometimes suffereth vs to bee tempted, to punish vs for our sinnes present or past, or to make vs triumphant and victorious in temptation, when it pleaseth him so to prooue vs, for his glorie and our good. For this is most true, that God beeing our Father, will neuer suffer vs to faint, or to bee overthrowen in the assaults of our enemies. And praying to bee deliuered from euill, it is to bee defended from all hurts and danger, proceeding from the Diuill, from men, or from our owne corruption. For hauing God for our warrant and defence, wee need not feare any thing.

Math. 26.39. Luke 6.12. To bee brieft, and to conclude our Meditation, let vs carefully marke how our Lord Iesus Christ, hath not onely commanded vs to pray: but hee himselfe also gaue a singular and speciall example; who oftentimes withdrew himselfe apart to pray, and therein spent whole nights. Now if hee that was exempted from sinne, prayed: If three times in one night hee asked one selfe something of God, bounding his request on these wordes, Thy will, O Father, bee done: With what face can wee, poore sinners, well abstaine from praying vnto God, and how should wee bee weary of so necessary a worke, or withall patience to attend, vntill we receiue the fruits and efficacie thereof? Let vs watch and pray, that we enter not into temptation, that in the day of the Lord, we may bee found wise and faithfull seruants, to bee made happy and blessed for euer.

2. Consideration of the excellencie and efficacie of Prayer made in faith, with a good and a Christian resolution.

Wee ought all to acknowledge and confesse, that among the principall points of the seruice which wee are bound to yeeld vnto our God and Father, prayer hath not the last nor least part therein: when with a true and liuely faith, well assured that wee are of the number of his children by Iesus Christ, wee present our selues before his heauenly throne, bee it publikely in the Church, or priuately in our secret chambers; to speake familiarly with him; to discover our griefes and troubles vnto him; to shew him our corporall or spirituall paines; to make him acquainted with our necessities; and of the need which wee haue of his grace in our infirmities; and to desire, that according to his great mercie, and for the loue of his welbeloued Sonne, hee would haue compassion on vs, and graunt vs that which hee knoweth to bee necessary for our good and saluation. But to pray deuotly, and according to the order aforesaid, taught vs by the Lord himselfe: first, the requests which wee make vnto God when wee pray, must bee done in such manner, that before all things, wee must seeke for the glory of God, and the aduancement of his kingdome: otherwise wee should (in a manner) begin backward, if wee abase heauen, to aduance earth, place place man before God his Creator, & first make petition for our own private commodities, and afterward follow on with that, which ought to be dearer and more recommended vnto vs, then our owne soules, that is, the glory of our God, and the care of his honour. Wee reade of the Prophet Elias, who in his time was visited with many tribulations, miseries, anguishes, and troubles, (if euer any man was,) and by consequent, had occasion according to humane infirmitie, to seeke for, and to aske of God, ease in his paines, returne out of exile, enioying of his goods, remedy against hunger, company in solitarie life, deliuerance out of dangers, defence and iustification against slaunders, honor in imbasement; and to conclude all that which is requisite and necessary to make this life pleasing, contented, assured, and honourable, (for all these things hee seemed to want.) Neuerthelesse, wee see none of all these things to be placed before, or in the first part of his prayers and complaints to God, but onely that he was ielous for the Lords sake, because the children of Israel had forsaken his covenant, cast downe his Altars, and slaine his Prophets. Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, & Iacob (said he,) let it be known this day, that thou art the God of Israel, and that I am thy seruant, and that I haue done all these things at thy commandement, heare me, Oh Lord, heare me, and let his people know, that thou art the Lord God, and that thou hast turned their hearts againe at the last.

Thus was this holy man blessed in heauen and his prayer heard, for that, forgetting himselfe, he prayed for the glory of God: which ought also to be set before and preferred in all our prayers. For doing so, wee can not chuse, but by experience feele the infinit riches of the most powerfull God, who without ceasing, by his most great liberality, recompenseth with an infinitie of blessings, the prayers which we make in the name of his sonne our Lord Iesus Christ, as by him we haue access to the throno of glory, there to finde al need. fullayde and releefe. And in truth, prayer serueth vs in manner of a chariot to beare and lift vs vp to heauen, to speake with God, and to obtaine those things of him, which without this onely meanes were impossible for man to attaine vnto: witnesse Moyse, who by his prayers, was the cause of victory to the Israelites: Iosua, stayed the Sun by the same means: Elias procured fire to come downe from heauen, and obtained celestially powers to helpe him: And Ezechias in his weake and feeble state of sickenes, obtained perfect health. Prayer is a sound and solide counsel for vs in most doubtful causes, it comforteth vs in desolation, it is a safe haven and releefe vnto vs, in time of torments, a remedy in griefe, a heap of treasure, in necessity, a deliuerance in danger, a retract in exile, and in our most hard assaults an impregnable place; and to be short, there is no crosse nor trouble so difficult, which prayer doth not molifie, and maketh the issue thereof, in what manner soeuer, tend to the good & saluation of the faithfull. Therefore Ioa said, Whosoener shall call vpon the name of the Lord shall be saued. And Iacob found the certaine effect thereof, when hee saw his brother E. Iacob heart from cruel, to become courteous; from angry peaceable; and from furious, gentle. But specially, let vs note, how many times Dauid hath by praier beene drawne out of trouble, and deliuered out of innumerable dangers of enemies, sorrowes, and anguishes? His diuine Psalmes make mention thereof, which so highly extol the fidelity of God, which heard the languishing voice of his faithfull seruant, when he called vpon him in his troubles. Oh Lord I haue called vpon thee (saith he) surely thou wilt heare me, O God encline thine eare to me, and hearken vnto my words, shew thy marvellous mercies, thou that art the Sauer of the that trust in thee, from such as resist thy right hand. And I wil call vpon the Lord, which is worthy to be praised, so shall I be safe from mine enemies. The sorrowes of death compassed me, and the floods of wickednes made me afraide. The sorrowes of the graue compassed me about, the snares of death ouertooke mee, but in my trouble I called vpon the Lord, and cryed vnto my God, and he heard my voice out of his Temple, and my cry did come before him euen in his eares. And Esay saith, Seeke the Lord, while he may be found, call vpon him while he is neere. And Iesus Christ saith, Watch and pray, that you enter not into temptation.

All which things neuerthelesse, we must vnderstand to be in such manner attributed vnto prayer, that we must not refer the things to the worke selfe, but to the power, grace and mercy of God, for that it is he, who being moued with paternal pittie, and full of goodnesse, sheweth forth his vertue, to graunt that vnto his children, which their prayers made by faith in Iesus Christ require and desire according to his will, in such manner, that he can finde a remedy in things impossible to men, and raise vp admirable meanes to make his seruants feele his powerful aide and succour, in their most grievous and dangerous troubles.

Againe, let vs note, that it is fit and conuenient for those that pray, to obserue temperance and modestie in their words, with a staied manner full of reuerence and humilitie; remembering that it is before the face of God, that wee present our selues. And therefore let vs learne, both in countenance, gesture and voice, to please that great King of heauen and earth our Father: being most certaine that there is nothing, which so much recomendeth praier, then modestie and simplicitie. Wee know also, that God commendeth that praier which is made apart and secretly in our Chambers, as a thing agreeing to faith, to make vs know, that God is in all places, and that the fulnesse of his Maiestie penetrateth euen into the most secret places. And therefore, he willinglyer hearkeneth to the heart, then to the voice, and openly giueth vs that, which hee secretly seeth in our thoughts and mindes, humbled before his face. It is said of Anna Samuels mother, That she spake vnto the Lord in her heart: So that her praier being secret her faith was manifest, wherein also shee was heard. Wee also haue another example of a well ordered and modest praier, in the person of the Publican, who shewing the true signes of an humble heart, in confessing his sinnes, obtained the fruits of his request. Mens sinnes are a thicke wall betweene God and them, which oftentimes hindereth his grace to come vnto vs, and our principall felicitie consisteth in the remission of our sinnes. Therefore the most conuenient preparation and disposition of praier is, the confession of our sinnes, proceeding from a dejected soule, bombled with the feeling of her owne vnworthinesse. And it is no maruell, if the object of her filthinesse maketh her fearefull to speake vnto that great God, before whose infinite Essence, man is lesse then nothing: and before his resplendant brightnesse, like dung. But the soule casting it selfe downe before his Maiestie, vnder the shadow of Christ, and couering it selfe with the honourable roabe of the perfect righteoussesse and holinesse which is in this Saviour of the elect, shee yeeldeth a sweet smelling saour before God, and a pleasing show, that so confessing her owne miserie, and offences, with an humble heart, shee may receiue full pardon, and a new testimony of heauenly blessings.

Againe, when wee pray, all carnall thoughts and imaginations, must bee farre from vs, that the Spirit may onely bend it selfe to praier; that our hearts must bee wholly shut vp against Satan, and open vnto God; for the Diuell is craftie, alwaies seeking holes and creuices to slip into our vnderstandings, and to turne them from celestiaall meditations; by that meanes oftentimes causing vs to haue one thing in our hearts, and another in our tongues. It is not the sound of the mouth or tongue, which the Lord requireth, but the heart and thought.

Lastly, it is conuenient that our praier should not be barren, to haue the more efficacie, but ioined with all good workes; and therefore the holy Scripture often ioyneth it with Almes and Fasting. Praier is a good thing with fasting, almes, and righteoussesse. And we read of good Cornelius the Centurion, That fasted and prayed, and that his praier was heard, and his almes were had in remembrance in the sight of God. And Esay saith, that among other things which the Lord requireth of all that call vpon his name, it is, That with fasting they should lose the bands of wickednesse, and breake their bread to the hungry, and couer the naked. And in Isaiah we reade, Therefore also now the Lord saith, Turne you vnto me with all you heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning. And rent your heart, and not your clothes, and turne vnto the Lord your God, for hee is gracious and mercifull, slow to anger, and of great kindnesse, and repenteth him of the euill. Sanctifie your fasts, call a sollemne assembly, and say, O Lord spare thy people, and giue not thine heritage into reproch. All these are good and conuenient meanes to make our praier fruitful, and by taming the flesh, to make the Spirit freer and prompter, well and truely to call vpon God: all superstition, boasting, and vaine glory, being wholly cut off, and laid aside. And let vs say, that happy are those whom the Lord shall finde in that sort watching and praying, either when he taketh them out of this world, by their ordinary death, or when in a moment, or in the twinkling of an eye, they shall bee transformed in the latter, and great day of his comming, wherein hee will iudge the quicke and the dead.

3. Meditations vpon the Creed.

After praier, wee haue the Confession of our Faith, which is commonly called, The Apostles Creed, wherein specially wee comfort our selues. For all religion (which is a reuelation revelation from heaven, teaching vs the meanes how to honour God, and to attaine eternall life) hath for a principle, and ground, To beleue, that such was the inscrutable counsel of God, that man by him created entire and vpright, to make him happy for his glorie, (but yet free and capable to fall) sinning by distrust and pride, and falling from his glorious estate, should bee releued and saved by faith. And that as in the beginning he being puffed vp with a desire of all knowledge, and to be equall with his Creator, hee should by his disobedience erre, and be the cause of his owne destruction. So in his regeneration (wherein God would establish the felicitie of his elect) man learning to know nothing els but one Iesus Christ, and him crucified: should denie himselfe, and all presumption of humane wisdom, to beleue and wholly to be led and guided by the word of the Gospel, and thereby to be brought into the way of heaven. Which doctrine beeing most large and ample, the Primitive Church (by direction of the holy Ghost) gathered all the principall points thereof, concerning saluation, into certaine brieve summaries, and reduced them into the Articles of the faith, which wee haue in the Creed. Which briefly comprehendeth, and yet singularly and evidently, the summe of our Christian profession; in such manner, that although it is onely called the Apostles Creede, neuertheless, it also containeth that which the Prophets taught, as in effect there is no other difference, betweene the Law and the Gospel, touching their substance, then of one Iesus Christ to come, and of him being come. So that, in this Creede wee haue a true declaration, and a certaine accomplishing of all that which had beene written before. Which is, I beleue in God the Father almighty, maker of heauen and earth, &c.

1. Cor. 2. 2.

In this Creede, we haue foure principall parts, whereby Religion is compleate: The first, of God the Father, author and fountaine of all things by his great power. The second, of Iesus Christ, the eternall Word and wisdom of God, in which part also is contained the historie of mans redemption. The third of the holy Ghost, the infinite vertue of the Father and the Sonne. The fourth, the Church their common familie, and of the graces of God towards it. So that wee learne by these foure summaries of our faith, That there is one onely eternall God, of one spirituall, infinite, and simple Essence, distinguished in three persons, Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost: (Iehoua) Which is, which onely is: or (Ehe ie, Ehe ie) I will bee that I will bee, or I am that I am. That in this vnitie of Essence, euery one of the persons retaining, that which is proper vnto him in the Deitie: The Father is the principall, and the beginning of all, and the first and soueraigne cause of all creatures, which hath made things visible and inuisible, in them to manifest his glory, and to bring man, (the head of his worke) to eternall beatitude. That the Sonne, borne of the Father before all worlds, and that was from the beginning with him, consubstantiall, and by the which all things were made, is the life and light of men, and their way to come vnto God, he being made flesh, and dwelt among them, that hee might giue vnto those that beleue in his name: The right to be called children of God: and to purchase this benefit for them, dyed once for their sinnes, and rose againe for their iustification. That the holy Ghost eternally proceeding from the Father and the Sonne, is hee, by whom so many graces subside, and are communicate to the faithfull, by regenerating, sanctifying, and giuing them the water of life, in them to be made a fountaine of water flowing to eternal life. That there is one holy Catholike Church, wherein we must receiue all his graces and celestially blessings, because in it onely God sendeth his spirit vpon all his seruants, to saue them as hee hath called them in Iesus Christ. And to be short, we gather by all these great and high mysteries of Christian Religion, vnknowne, and incomprehensible to all humane wisdom: that the goodnesse and loue of God the Father, the Creator, is the fountaine and first cause of the Soueraigne good which we hope for in heaven. That his Sonne, the Redeemer, bringeth vs this grace, as a River spring from that fountaine, and a neerer cause to vs by the satisfaction which he hath made for vs to diuine Iustice, hauing put on our flesh. That the holy Ghost, the sanctifier, communiceth his gifts with all efficacie in vs by degrees heere on earth, finally, to make vs enioy saluation in heaven. And that to keepe and to make vs walke intallibly in this beatitude, God calleth vs in his Sonne there to make vs participants of his blessings and rich treasures, which he committeth vnto her as a gage, that she may conferre them by his holy ministerie to all the members of Iesus Christ her Spouse, to the end that they may liue and die vnto him betweene the armes of their mother, passing from this world to the kingdome of heaven. For eternall saluation

4. Meditations and Prayers touching Faith, and to obtaine encrease thereof.

The soule of every man is naturally full of ignorance, and his flesh of vanitie, hee cannot (being brutish) comprehend any thing of the Deitie, whereof the Essence is infinite, the workes miraculous, the mercies without end, and the iudgements most profound. In the meditation of these things, our spirit is as it were swallowed vp, and therein loseth all his reason. Whereunto also the diuers calamities of this life, which astonish and beate vs downe, stirre vp impatience, and frame rebellion and murmuring in vs, because wee are ignorant of the power, wisdom, and iustice of God; whereby, as well of good things, as of euils, he maketh a most iust and most perfect dispensation and distribution; but specially, our ignorance, incredulitie, and distrust is great, as well in that which concerneth the admirable worke of the creation of the world, as in the miraculous worke of our redemption. For being borne blinde of vnderstanding, and heardned in heart wee cannot comprehend nor beleue those wonders which surpasse all wonders.

Our soule (I say) being weake, cannot vnderstand how God hath created all things of nothing, and how he was from the beginning in Christ, reconciling himselfe vnto men. Flesh cannot finde God in man, nor consider him to be Mediator betweene God and humaine nature. These are hidden and sealed letters vnto vs, that the generation of the diuine, pure and holy word, exempted from all spots and vncleannesse, was given vs for Iustification and Sanctification, and for the Author of peace and eternall blessing. That his wounds are our healing; his condemnation, our absolution; that his deformitie, is our beautie; in his travels and passions, our rest and victorie; in his abiectnesse, our honour; in his reiection, our recalling; in his death, our life; in his grave, our resurrection; in the anguishes and dolours of his soule, our true paradise: And to be short, the flesh cannot beleue, that in this Man-God triumphant, thus ouer sinne, death and the deuill, consisteth our triumphes, and the summe and full effect of our felicitie. And yet it is the summe of that which is taught vs in the Symbole of our Faith, and throughout the holy Scriptures. That is it which hath bene so many and so often times shewed vnto vs in the house of God (the Catholike Church.) But we haue not vnderstood it, nor beleued it so plainly nor so firmly as we should. Our eye hath beheld the holy sacred mysteries and signes of this most admirable redemption of man, and yet wee haue not perceiued, nor drawne the fruits which we ought to receiue, from the participation of these infallible gages of saluation, so vicious our incredulitie is. Even as the earth cannot comprehend the heavens, and that which is borne of flesh, being but flesh, is not capable to mount vp to the Spirit of life, of vnderstanding, and of wisdom. Then oh Lord our God Father of light from whom all good gifts proceed, which hast promised to powre out the Spirit of grace and compassion vpon thy seruants, we most humbly beseech thee, that for the loue of thy Son Iesus Christ, in whom it hath pleased thee to chose vs, and to blesse vs with all spiritual blessing, it would please thee also, to endue vs with true faith, whereby we may sufficiently comprehend the breadth, depth, length, and hight of thy loue towards vs, witnessed in Christ, God with thee, and man with vs, to tru st and comfort our selues in thee, all the dayes of our life, and to bring forth fruites to thy honour and glory and to the edification of our neighbours, that this faith may be a liuely faith, and a speaking faith which calleth and crieth vnto thee onely in the name of Iesus Christ, a faith working by charity, a faith patient in aduersity, a faith surmounting the world, by the meanes of thy invincible force (O most puissant God) and him whom thou hast ordayned to be our Lord, it is thy commandement that we should beleue in him whom thou hast sent, the savior of the elect, & that we should loue one another.

But alas, we know that al men haue not faith, & that it was an old complaint long since made by the Prophets and Apostles which say, Lord who hath beleued our report? on the other side: Oh God and Father, there are so many false Prophets and impostrous fellowes in the world, which tell their owne dreames and inuentions in stead of thy holy word, and which in the meane time transforme themselves in o angels of light, and also there are so many many assaults, persecutions, and miseries, which fright men: and the vanity & imbecility of our nature is such, that it suffereth it selfe to be easily caried away with all winds; If thou (O threefold great, and most merciful Lord) workest not that in vs which thou commandest, if thou thy selfe doest not bring vs vnto thy Sonne. For otherwise wee cannot come vnto him. And if he giueth vs not access to the throne of thy grace, wee can by no meanes approach vnto it, as also if thy holy spirit doth not conduct vs in all truth, and doth not beare witness thereof in our hearts that thou art our Father, it is not in our power, to cry Abba, Father. May it please thee then, thou that art the onely God, three persons in one Essence, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost: according to thy mercifull promise, to purifie my heart, by faith, to dwell and remaine with mee thy poore creature, to preserve and keepe my spirit from being seduced by errors, my soule for affecting any other thing, then thy good will, pleasure, and holy word, and my heart from desiring any other but thee, which art the soueraigne good, which art my all in all, and my abundant portion, that hauing, and louing thee, I may despise this world, forsake and renounce all vanities, taste and sauour the delights and pleasures of thy house, louing nothing but in thee, and for the loue of thee, and attending the most happy and blessed houre, wherein I shall no more walke by faith, but by sight, in the contemplation of thy face. Worke so (Oh my most mercifull God) that daily increasing in faith, I may attaine to the measure of a perfect Christian, in that admirable day of the restoring of all things, to receiue the incorruptible crowne of righteousness and glory, and at thy right hand to feele the fulnesse of ioy and gladnesse. 5. Meditations and Prayers touching God the Father, most puissant Creator of heauen and earth.

God in the Articles of our faith, is described vnto vs, by his workes to bee the same, which his word reuealeth him to bee. To that ende, that the knowledge which we ought to haue of him, should not bee a vaine apprehension: and that wee should plainly see, that wee haue good cause, to put our trust in him, as also that wee may the better bee discerned from those people, which doe not truly know God. Then this is the proper giift of the faithfull, to know God, as hee is: that is, in one essence, and neuertheless in three persons (the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost) and hee that doeth not acknowledge the Father, knoweth not what the Sonne is; and he that knoweth not the Sonne, knoweth not the Father: and he that beleueth not in the holy Ghost, neither knoweth the Father nor the Sonne, and so is altogether ignorant of the Deitie.

But although that God is our father, as we call him in the Lords prayer, yet we are but children by adoption, receiued, and adopted for the loue of his onely and eternall Sonne, eternally begotten by the father, and in whom he is wel pleased. Then in this diuine essence the first person is called Father, to shew vs, that our faith is grounded only in God, although this true and onely Deity which we adore, and wherein we beleue, is the Father, the Sonne and the holy Ghost: who in these three persons working together, manifested himselfe vnto the world, by foure most diuine and supernaturall workes, that is, the creation of the world, the redemption of man, the gathering together and preservation of the Church, and the admirable gifts and benefits bestowed vpon the same, specially the remission of sinnes, and life euermlasting. What great aduantage is it vnto vs, to know this true God, for that by this knowledge we may say with Saint Paul, That all things are ours, because we are Christs, and Christ Gods, which is the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, hee is also called most puissant, because his throned being in heauen, he doth all whatsoever he will, and whose power is conioined with truth and iustice. Then we are happy, whose faith is not grounded vpon the wisdom of men, but on the power of God, which is saluation to all that beleue. Likewise he is the creatour, For who is he (saith Esay) that hath measured the waters with his fitt, and compassed the heauens with his spanne? who is he that hath comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountaines in a weight, and the hilles in a balance? Who hath instructed the Spirit of the Lord, or was his Counsellor, or taught him? All nations before him are as nothing, and they are accounted to him lesse then nothing, and vanitie. To whom then will you liken God? or what similitude wil you set vp vnto him? lift vp your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, and bringeth out their armies by numbers, and calleth them all by names; by the greatnesse of his power, and might.

mighty strength, nothing faileth. Why sayest thou O Iacob, and speakest oh Israel, My way is hid from the Lord, and my Iudgement is passed over by God? Knowest thou not, or hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the Lord hath created the ends of the earth, hee neither fainteth, nor is wearie, there is no searching of his understanding.

Hereby wee learne, that is is proper vnto our God, To giue a beginning to all things, to make that to bee which is not, and to produce and bring forth a creature of nothing. As Saint Paul saith, That God quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which bee not, as though they were. And that of him, and through him, and for him, all things are, to him be glory for ever. Herein wee must not giue any place to the speculations or contemplations of the flesh, and of those fooles that haue disputed to know how it is possible that of nothing all things were made, seeking to measure the infinite power of the Deitie, by their vaine discourses, for want of knowing the force, and vertue of this world. But that which the vnderstanding cannot comprehend, Faith is bound to beleue it, as it is written, By faith wee understand, that the world was ordeined by the word of God: to shew that the things which we see, are not made of things which did appeare. For (as an Auncient Father said) the whole circuit or compasse of the world, is a notable booke for vs, (Wherein there is as many leaves, as there are creatures in the world) therein with great praise all the daies of our liues to reade and peruse the name of God, and in the same to learne to know him. Lastly, to the work of the creation, is ioyned the doctrine of the prouidence of God, and of the admirable disposition of all things. For if God had onely created the world, and did not gouerne, dispose, and maintaine all the things, and parts thereof, hee should not be Almighty. Therefore the Scripture saith, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work with him, blessing, multiplying, preserving, restoring, and disposing all things for his glorie, and the saluation of his Elect. Hee beholdeth (saith Iob) the endes of the world, and seeth all that is vnder beauen, to make the waight of the windes, and to waigh the waters by measure. When hee made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightening of the Thunders. But thou (said Dauid) diddest draw mee out of the wombe, thou gauest mee hope, euen at my mothers brests. I was cast vpon thee euen from the wombe, thou art my God from my mothers belly.

Then O Lord God my Father, and most puissant Creatour, which created mee when I was nothing, and canst again when it pleaseth thee to reduce me to nothing. When I was feeble, and vndone, diddest recreate me, to bring me to greater glory, seeing thou presentest thy selfe vnto me, vnder the sweet name of Father, let me not be a negligent child to call vpon thee, and seeing thou art so ready to enlarge and bestow thy benefits vpon me, let not mee bee slow nor carelesse to require them of thee. To the which end, my good God, giue me grace I beseech thee, to feele how necessary thy ayde is for me. To me I say (poore wretch,) which neither haue nor possesse any thing, but of the meere mercy & bounteous liberality, and with whom neuerthelesse nothing can prosper without thy blessing. I confesse the great imperfections which are in me, concerning celestiall things. For that neither faith, loue, nor repentance, could be in me, if thou most louing and benigne Father, diddest not enlarge the light of thy countenance vpon me, and helpe my infirmity. Every good thing and euery perfect gift is from aboue, and commeth downe from the father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Therefore I call vpon thee, being assured of thy promises, that thou maiest giue me, that which thou knowest better then my selfe to be necessary for me, for my saluation and eternall life. Giue me grace with a pure heart and thought, to meditate how great and admirable the benefites are (which thou hast prepared for them that loue thee,) in thy eternall kingdome, seeing (O Lord) here in this world, which is but a prison, thou giuest vs, the enioying of so many notable and excellent workes of thy hands, and that from thence I learne, to aspire to that felicity, which eye hath not seene, care hath not heard, tongue cannot expresse, nor heart comprehend, which beatitude is assured vnto vs, in the contemplation of thy face. that the crosses and troubles of this world, which shake and ouerthrowe so many men, may not hinder my soules quiet depending vpon thy prouidence, and from assuring my selfe of thy power. And as thou hast sustained me from my mothers wombe: may it please thee also to giue mee thy hand to support mee in my age, as beeing my perpetuall Father and Sauour.

Lastly, oh Lord, forasmuch as of our selues poore wormes of the earth, wee are not fit nor capable to thinke any good thing, I beseech thee alwaies to enspire my minde, and to conduct mee, guiding my steps, thoughts, intents, and workes. And for that all things helpe

Psal. 75. 8.

6. Meditations and Prayers, that Iesus Christ is the Sonne of God, and our Lord and Saviour.

The Creation of the World, conioyned with the Providence, Iustice, and Wisdom of the Lord is the first testimonie which is propounded vnto vs of God in the Articles of our Faith, to the end wee should adore him, and put our trust in him: But there is another ensuing it, which is much more admirable, and which representeth vnto vs his extreme bountie, goodnesse, and infinite power; that is, the worke of our Redemption, for to redeeme, and quicken a creature that was lost, and to redeeme him with so great a price, as the precious Blood of the eternall Sonne of God, and not onely to deliuer him out of captiuitie, and from Death, but also to giue him life Eternall, is so great a Worke, and so singular a benefit, that no tongue can expresse it, nor no heart is sufficient to comprehend it. Man (as the Scripture saith) was created good and righteous; but hee continued not in that happy estate: for, that following his owne inuentions, discourses, and the euill counsell of the Diuell, he turned from his God; and by that meanes fell into decay, making both himselfe and his Posteritie culpable of death and eternall damnation, for Death and all the Citations which hee serueth vpon vs, that is, all the aduersities which happen vnto vs in this world are the rewards of sinne. And our destruction proceedeth from our selues, because our first Father abusing his owne free-will, became a slaue to Sathan, and by that meanes drew vpon himselfe and all his Posteritie, the iust vengeance of God. What a change and pitifull alteration was it, when the Image of God in man was so disfigured? and that so noble a creature became vile, miserable, full of sinne and filthinesse? For although Adam was created and made of the dust of the earth, yet the Spirit of God had swallowed vp in him that matter of terrestriall corruption, if he had not sinned, and all Mankind had been exempted from weaknesse and putrification, whereas now by nature he is nothing else but dust and filth, endowed with a heart altogether peruerse from his Infancie, which is the cause that he hath neede of regeneration, not of mortall seed (as Saint Peter saith) but of immortall, that is, by the Word of God which lieth & endureth for euer, which teaching vs to beleue the Deitie, for a true object and sure foundation of our faith, giueth vs Iesus Christ the second person of this Deitie one in essence. For beleueing in him, we beleue in God, because Christ is God ouer all, blessed for euer (as the Apostle saith) and of whom Moses and all the Prophets spake, and to whom they direct vs, as hee is the substantiall image of the inuisible God. And the brightnes of his glory, and the ingraued forme of his person, by whom also the Father spake, and hath made all things, and which is more this diuine word, tooke our nature vpon him, and made himselfe Emanuel, that is, God with vs, and was manifest in the flesh. Whereupon Saint Paul teacheth vs, that other foundation can no man lay, then that which is laid, which is Iesus Christ: saying further, that he esteemed not to know any thing among the faithfull saue Iesus Christ, and him crucified: Not that he would not also acknowledge God the Father, and the holy Ghost, but because in the second person of this vspeakable Trinitie, we know him wholly, and that without Christ we can not know what the father is, nor haue access to his vnaccessable light: If the Sonne doth not giue vs an entrance thereinto withall assurance. But we must note, that this grace, (with a sauing knowledge, to know the liuing and eternall God, that is, to acknowledge him by Christ and by him to call vpon him confessing him to be very God, and very man, and the onely mediator betweene God and man, is a gift proper to those that are faithfull and elect children of God. For against this truth, the diuell hath at all times raised vp false Prophets, to darken and extenuate this sauing knowledge of Christ in the world, according to the prophesie of Simeon, saying, Behold this child is appointed for the fall and rising of many in Israel, and for a signe which shall be spoken against.

But we haue good and infallible conclusions, to oppose against their errors. As first, that it was requisite and necessary for vs to haue such a Sauour and Mediator that was very God and very man, and which participateth (to be a Mediatour,) of both natures, diuine and humane, which were at variance, that he might reconcile them, and in such manner, that to overcome and vanquish sinne, death and the diuell, and to giue access vnto men, to the inaccessible light of God, he should be stronger then all creatures, that is, God, and the beloued of the father, in whom he might be pleased with vs: as on the other side, it was requisite that in the flesh, which had bene overcome by sinne, the victory should be gotten, & that the flesh which had sinned, should suffer the punishment, which Christ also tooke on him: and to be short, to haue pity on vs, that hee should communicate with our infirmities and miseries, that he might beget brethren, and carry our nature vp into heauen, as the earnest of our hope, and whereof he hath giuen vs an other most certaine earnest, that is, his holy Spirit, as Tertullian learnedly discourseth, saying, That we beleue in Iesus Christ, not that we haue diuers sorts of faith. For there is but one God and one faith, and the Father, and the Sonne are one. But we beleue in God, as hee reueiled himselfe by the creation of heauen and earth, and in his holy word, which testifieth vnto vs, that the eternall Sonne of God, Iesus Christ, taking our nature vpon him, at the time appointed and preordained by the Father, to be the mediator of the alliance and contract made by our Creator, by vnitng the two natures, diuine and humane, hath reconciled vs with God his Father, when by his obedience and merits, by his force and incomprehensible bounty, and by his death, and passion he made satisfaction for our sinnes, and by his resurrection vanquished death, & hel, and ascended vp into heauen, there to be a perpetuall Mediatour for vs, in such manner, that for the loue of him God loueth vs, and his righteousness being imputed vnto vs, as if it were our owne, God accepteth vs for iust, and so we are certaine and assured that neither the law giuen by Moses hath power to condemne vs, nor death, nor the diuell, to make vs afraide, seeing that Christ clothes vs with his perfect righteousness, and that for vs he hath overcome all that which could make vs afraid, or doubtfull.

To conclude, we beleue, not onely the history of the nativity, life, death, passion, resurrection and ascension of the Lord, but also, every faithfull Christian, by faith appropriateth and applieth to himselfe all the benefits which hee hath gotten and obtained for vs, assureth and comforteth himselfe, with his holy and amiable promises, and apprehendeth him as true Iesus, sauing and blessing vs, & which hath by his precious blood prepared eternall saluation for vs in a happy and blessed life for ever. Thus much for the first conclusion and most certaine foundation which we oppose against those, which acknowledge not as they ought, the admirable counsell of God, which hath provided vs such a Mediatour and Sauour as was needfull for vs.

Secondly, wee haue for an inuincible reason the perpetuall consent of the olde and new Testament touching Christ, wherein wee see, that the same which the Ceremonies of the Law had foreshewed, by the exquisite and diuine Service therein celebrated, was perfectly accomplished in Iesus Christ; as it is notably expounded and declared in all the Writings of the Apostles, (specially in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is prooued that Christ was the end of the Law.) And finally, this Doctrine concludeth the effect of this sauing knowledge of God in his Sonue, which giueth quietnesse and peace of conscience to the Faithfull, in such manner, that with great ioy many haue willingly suffered death for the name of Iesus; and to the contrary, the end of those which blasphemed it, was alwaies most miserable: as that of Cerintus, Maunes, Arius, and others.

Then most gracious Lord God, our Father, for as much as it is life eternall for vs to know thee, and that we cannot know thee, but in thine ingrauen Image, Iesus Christ, manifested in the flesh, I beseech thee to conduct me by thy holy Spirit to the true knowledge of thy Eternall Sonne, and in the studie and meditation of so sauing a Secret, to giue me such a resolution, that with the good and blessed Apostle I may esteeme all things as dung in regard of that excellent knowledge of Christ our Sauour. And first (oh God) giue mee grace, with all men, truely to acknowledge my common necessitie, that is, that wee had neede of such a Soueraigne Sacrificator, holy, innocent, without blame, seperated from all other sinners, and that was very God and very Man. Also, heavenly Father, I beseech thee liuely to imprint in my heart the feeling and confession of this thy admirable charitie which hath shewed so great loue to vs poore sinners, as to make thy sauing grace appeare in Iesus

Iesus Christ thy beloved Sonne, sauing vs not for our workes, but of thy meere mercie, and for the merits of his death and passion. Oh what loue, fauour, and humilitie, hath this great King of heauen shewed, in taking on him the forme of a seruant, and imba-sing himselfe, euen to the death of the Crosse, for vs poore slaues, and wormes of the earth. But before all things (O most mercifull God) giue mee knowledge to learne Christ well, and not to bee like those, which liue disorderly, with carnall libertie, abusing that so happy, and so profitable knowledge, but rather that I may put it to the true vse; which is, to humble the faithfull, and to make them confused in themselves, to see that our sinnes were so great and so inorme, that hee was faine to redeeme them with so great a price, and that so I may onely praise and magnifie thy bounty, hauing all my ioy and glory in thee, my Lord and Father.

And lastly, that in all calamities and humane tribulations, I may alwaies cast my sight vpon that good Iesus, which suffered so much for vs, directing my actions to the eternall saluation which hee hath prepared for vs: and denying my selfe, to liue to the praise of him, that hath redeemed mee.

7. Meditation and Prayer vpon this article, that the holy Ghost is our instructor, sanctificator, and comforter.

The Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost (as it hath already beene said) is but one onely true God, and one selfe same Deitie, like glory, and one coeternall maiestie. But this one true God, did in such manner manifest himselfe to the world, that the Father is properly called the Creator, the Sonne, the redeemer, and the holy Ghost our instructor and sanctificator. For although this inseparable Trinitie, worketh together in all his workes, neuertheless for our greater consolation, it hath made it selfe in such sort knowne to men, that they may vnderstand (by instigation of his heavenly light) that without confounding the persons, or separating the substance of this onely Deity, euery one of them retaineth that, which is proper vnto him in the things which belong to our saluation.

And as the Sonne is eternally begotten of the Father, so the holy Ghost, proceedeth eternally both from the Father and the Sonne. So that beleeuing in the holy Ghost, we doe not beleue, that the same spirit is onely a certaine moouing or inspiration: but first we beleue against the Macedonians, (ancient heretickes,) that he is very God, of the same essence with the Father and the Sonne, and for that cause we cast the ancker of our faith in him. For we are as well baptized in his name, as in the name of the Father and of the Sonne and of whom we being made the Temples, we are made the Temples of God, (as the Scripture saith,) the Father, the word, and the holy Ghost are one. Again, we beleue, that for the loue and in the name of Iesus Christ, this spirit comforteth and sanctifieth our soules, and that by the inspiration thereof, the holy Prophets and Apostles haue spoken, and for that cause also he is called the gift of God, who being but one in himselfe, produceth in vs diuers operations for our edification and saluation. For as (S. Bernard very wel saith), We were dead in sinne and stinking creatures: But Iesus Christ imbalmeth vs with his holy spirit, and hath annointed vs, to the end, that we might know the true God, and tast and feele his mercy. This is the heate of the diuine Sonne, which warmeth vs: this is the pure water of the celestiall riuers, which sprinkle and renew vs: this is the balme which maketh vs a good flavor: and this is the oyle, which comforteth and strengtheneth vs. Then where is the tongue that can expresse, the bounty of God towards vs, of the Father, which created vs, after his own image, of the word, that redeemed vs by his precious blood, & of the holy Ghost, which sanctifieth vs by his vertue? By the first Adam, we were made barren and vnprofitable, and were debarred from the grace of God, but the Lord had saide by his Prophet, I will powre vpon the house of David, and vpon the inhabitants of Ierusalem, the spirit of grace and of compassion, that they shall looke vpon me, whom they haue pierced, for the saluation of the world. For although that from the time of the fathers vnder the law, God did many great things in his mercy to men, yet it is proper to Iesus Christ, to giue vs the Spirit of grace, of mercy, and of inuocation.

And it is the greatest and richest gift which we can haue from heauen, for that, (as the Apostle saith) without this spirit, we belong not to Christ, and cannot be assured that we are the children of God. It was miraculously & extraordinarily giuen vpon the day of Pentecost, but now euery day, it ioyneth his eternall operation, with the preaching of the Gospell, and is the cause that with assurance we call vpon our Father which is in heauen, Whosoever (saith Christ) drinketh of the water that I shall giue him, shall neuer bee more a thirst. But the water that I shal giue him, shall be in him a Well of water, springing vp into euermore life. This water is the efficacy and the worke of the Spirit of God, working by his word. David had well felt the effects thereof, when hee saide. As the Hart brayeth for the riners of water, so panteth my soule after thee Oh God. The holy Ghost (because of his fruites) is sometime called fire; because hee purifieth, and consumeth our euill affections, and kindleth in vs a true zeale to the honour and glory of God, as it is sayd of the Disciples going to Emas, that their hearts burnt within them, when they heard Iesus speake. Sometimes he is called water, because he refresheth vs, in and against the burning heat of carnall temptations, and washeth and comforteth vs to quench the fierie darts of Sathan (as the Apostle saith.)

But we are specially to remember the notable title of comforter, which Iesus Christ giueth to the holy Ghost, saying, that he should teach the Apostles all things, and leade them to the vnderstanding of him. God our Father (saith Saint Paul) hath loued vs, and hath giuen vs euermore saluation, and good hope through grace. But it is by his spirit the Comforter, that wee remaine firme and constant in the faith of our saluation, that we may neuer faint nor faile, by the temptations or afflictions, which ordinarily happen vnto the world. For when we are once supported by the protection and defence of the holy Ghost, there is nothing that can abash, or make vs afraide. It is true that the holy doctrine of the Gospell, doth not presentlie produce his fruits in perfection, neither doe wee profite so well therein, as oftentimes wee desire. Yet wee must not bee discouraged, but alwaies hope well, vntill the holy Ghost, which is the interior instructor of the soules of the faithfull, speaketh in our hearts, and telleth vs of those things which wee haue either seene with our eyes, or heard with our eares in the Gospell. For although Esaie pronounceth this vnto the incredulous, That the word of God shall be vnto them as a Booke sealed vp: neuertheless, the Lord oftentimes humbleth those that are his, after the same manner. Therefore they must patiently and peaceably stay the fit time of the reuelation from above, every one in the meane time encreasing his talent according to the measure that hee hath received, to the ende that hauing but a little, he may obtaine more.

Oh most eternall G O D, which onely dwellest in the vnaccessable light, take compassion I beseech thee on my darkenesse, which can beget nothing in mee, but the accursed state of death eternall. For whosoever walketh in the obscuritie of his nature, stumbleth grievously, and no man can erre in thy presence (oh God most iust) but he falleth into the snares of Sathan, if thy grace doth not preuent his destruction. But as the Sunne illuminateth the world, and the light of mans eyes guide his body: So the onely light of thy Spirit, is the guide of the soule, and in the shadow of death, thy Sonne Iesus Christ is the cleare light illuminating all thy workes, but his light, is vnto vs as a darke night, vnlesse the holy Ghost leadeth vs to see the hope of eternall life in the great Saviour of the world, and maketh the eies of our vnderstanding clearer then the eies of the Eagle, which lookes vpon the great light of the world. Christ is the Sonne of righteousness about whom we must flocke to draw life vnto vs, which in this mortall and terrestriall pilgrimage, cannot by humane reason be perceived, without the light of the holy Ghost, which maketh vs seeke for victory in the Crosse, glorie in ignomie, rest in paine, profit in losse, ioy in teares, and life in death; learning vs to esteeme all things hurtfull in respect of our Emanuel, by whose meanes the Spirit of adoption is a certaine earnest and pawning vnto vs, of our redemption in eternall saluation. Lighten then my soule (oh heavenly Father) with thy holy light, that I may walke vprightly, in ioy and assurance of thy loue all the daies of my life, and that I may as much as is necessarie and requisite for the imbecilitie of my faith, penetrate into the knowledge of the sacred mysteries of the Gospell, which flesh and blood cannot comprehend. All men (oh God) are capable to reade and looke vpon the letter, but they onely, (whom thou illuminatest) to vnderstand the sense thereof, for the secrets thereof are hidden, from the greatest number of men, whose eies are blinded by the Diuell, and the deceits of worldly vanities. And therefore they cannot vnderstand, how thy word, is the onely knowledge, the true wisdom, the only pleasure of the soule, and the assured guide to keepe men from erring out of the way of heauen. But for my selte, thy holy conduction shall shall bee my treasure, and the price of my vowes. May it please thee then to create in mee a pure heart, and in the secrets of my soule to renew an vpright thought, cast mee not of from before thy face, and take not thy holy Spirit from mee: continue in mee the ioy of thy saluation, and let thy eternall arme sustaine mee: that in obedience of faith, I may alwaies giue place to thy holy Spirit, and neuer giue it cause of dislike by sinnes and vncleannesse, that it may guide me in all truth, that it may sanctifie and strengthen me vnto the end of my life, and that it may comfort me at my last end, praying and groaning for mee, with sighes which (oh my God) are pleasing vnto thee.

8. A Prayer full of comfort to the Trinitie, one onely God, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost.

Oh Deity, in three persons coequall and coeternall, in one essence, one God and true God, (Father, Son and holy Ghost) which only dwellest in eternitie, & in vnaccessable light to all flesh, which art, which was, and which continuest for euer, the first and the last, the beginning and the ending of all things: soveraigne and most puissant Creator and gouernor of all things that are, that liue, that feele, and that vnderstand, which hast spread abroad the heauens by the diuine wisdom, and layd the foundation of the earth by thy great power, by whose prouidence consisteth all moderation, beauty and order in the vniuersall world, in the contemplation whereof consisteth the only good and true felicity of man; the chiefe of all thy creatures: holy and triple holy: admirable and amiable, who being iust, wouldest not suffer, that man made after thine owne Image, for thy glory, and to serue thee, in blessed estate, should goe vnpunished having sinned, who being mercifull, diddest not withdraw thy mercy from him: and who being good, hast not neglected the least of thy works, euen to the haire of a beast, the smallest feather of a bird, & the least flower or leafe of an herbe, ingrauing in every one of thy creatures, certaine signes of thy glorie and maiestie, by the proportion and agreement of all their parts, as it were a sweet peace. Oh onely God in Trinitie, make, (I humbly beseech thee) thy wisdom and light, by their vertue, to enter into my soule, which honoureth and inuoketh thy name to make me vnderstand, and inwardly to see thy diuine wonders, in thy Spirit, which can do all things, which vnderstandeth and beholdeth all things, which animateth all things, and which without ceasing, passeth through all peaceable knowledge, and resideth in every one of thine elect.

Grant mee (oh eternall God, and most great and rich Father of heauen) that by this holy Spirit, I may with the eyes of faith, penetrate into the middle of thy celestially habitation, that there I may behold thy glorious face, and in it the blessednesse of thy children to praise thee incessantly; for thou hast promised to open the gates of thy kingdome, to all those that knocke thereat. Now is the time (oh God most mercifull) that the desires of my heart famished for want of heavenly bread, eleuate and lift vp themselves to thy holy sanctuary, and make mee knocke at thy doore. Before thy eies is all the desires of my soule, and my thoughts are not hidden from thee. Then turne not thy face away from mee, neither withdraw thy selfe, because of my indignity: but rather let it please thee benignly to hearken vnto the cry of thy seruant, that hath for his warrant the onely righteousness of Iesus Christ, our Emanuel, and God with vs. Therefore gracious Father, stretch forth thy comfortable hand, to draw me out of the waters and filthinesse of the earth, out of this lake of miserie, and out of this bottomlesse pit of euils, to the end that I bee not shut out of the sight of thy compassions, but rather that at the day when I shall leaue this earthly habitation, I may happely mount vp to thy supercelestiall dwelling, to be fully vnited to Christ my Sauour, and by him to thee, oh Father, which art the fountaine of eternall life. It hath pleased thee (oh mercifull Father) to witness and shew forth the great goodnesse, to make me know, according to the measure of thy grace which I haue receiued, the incomprehensible secret of thee, oh Father, begotten of none; of thee oh Sonne of God, eternally begotten of the Father; and of thee, oh holy Ghost, eternally proceeding from the Father and the Sonne, one onely God, vncreated, infinite, eternal, Lord and most puissant: grant then, oh ineffable and vspeakeable Trinitie, that beleeuing in my heart, and confessing with my mouth, the propriety of three persons, the vnitie of the Essence, and the equalitie of the glorie. In thee, true and onely God, I may adore, and serue thee for ever, according to thy holy ordinance; and that by this firme and constant faith, grounded vpon obedience, I may more and more drawe vnto mee the fauour of thy blessings, to the ende that as the Angels praise and glorified thee, the supercelestiall powers honour thee, and all the host of heaven magnifie thee. I may also once haue the honour to ioine my Canticles and songs with that celestiaill company, and enioy the same beatitude in the beholding of thy eternall light, oh glorious God. I hope in thee, I haue no trust nor confidence but in thy bounty, preferue mee then, from all euill, and from all corruption, to the end, that while I shall be clothed with this fraile flesh, my soule may alwaies praise thee, my tongue sing Psalmes vnto thee, and all my senses may agree and consent together, to say, Lord, and God, three in one, who is like vnto thee, which by thy infinite power hast made vs, even when wee were not, and when wee were lost and vtterly ouerthrowne by our owne fault: thou by thy loue, hast created vs anew, for thy greater glory. Then suffer me not to forget thy vnspeakable mercie, but make, that encreasing by faith in thy word, with hope in thy promises, and with true charitie, shewing forth the fruit thereof by good workes; I may ioyfully proceed in the course of my life, following my vocation, vntill I may obtaine the price of celestiaill felicitie, where beholding thy face, Oh holy and vnseparable Trinitie, I may fully adore thy Maiestie, singing this Himne with the blessed. Glory bee to thee oh Father, which hast created vs, glorie be to thee, oh Sonne, which hast redeemed vs, glorie be to thee oh holy Spirit which hast sanctified vs, and glorie bee to the most high Trinitie, one onely true God, whose kingdome is everlasting.

9. Meditation and Praier, touching the Catholike Church.

To beleue the Catholike or Vniuersall Church, is, First to beleue that notwithstanding the corruptions, Idolatries, superstitions, and disorders that are, and haue alwaies beene in the world, God the Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, chose his elect people, which hee called out of darkenesse (wherein we are all borne) into the light of the Gospel, reuealing himselfe by his holy testimonies, to those whom hee hath chosen, whom hee hath washed and sanctified, and in whom hee reigneth by his word, as in his kingdome, his Family, and his House, the pillar and ground of truth, set vpon the Corner stone of that diuine building, which is, Iesus Christ, against the which Church, The gates of Hell shall not preuaile, because all things worke together for the best, vnto them that loue God, who knoweth those that are his.

Secondly, wee protest and beleue, that wee are members of this true Church, and that wee vnite our selues thereunto, to bee true and faithfull Citizens, neuer abandoning nor forsaking the holy assemblies of Christians, and in them making that profession and confession of the Name of God, which the true children and seruants of GOD ought to doe.

Thirdly, it is to beleue and to protest, that we doe not beleue all assemblies and congregations indifferently, to be the holy Church, but that which is Apostolical, and vniuersall, gathered together by the preaching of the Gospel, & by the vse of the holy Sacraments in all places of the world, vnder one head which is Iesus Christ. As in him is grounded the Communion of Saints, by him made members of one body, participating one spirit, one selfe same word, and one order of the sacred Mysteries of saluation. Which faithfull Christians are also vnited by the band of peace, and conioyned by true loue, calling vpon one Saviour, and as brethren expecting one selfe same inheritance, which is eternall life. For the giftes which God presenteth to his Church are remission of sinnes, and life everlasting, which we cannot find out of the dungeon or fort of saluation, the Catholike church. In the deluge, all liuing creatures perished; onely Noah and those that entred into the arke with him: which was an infallible figure of the assurance which all the children of God may lay hold on, that they cannot perish in the Church: which the most amiable Tabernacle (whereof the Prophet speaketh) doeth represent; God in it giuing testimonies of his presence, and there was iauoked, as in this time of grace, the true Couenant and Congregation of the Lord, is in the holy Temple of the Christians: for it is the true Ierusalem, which also was figured by the royall Prophet Dauid, saying, Ierusalem is builded as a citie that is compassed together in it selfe, whereunto the Tribes euen the Tribes of the Lord goe up, to praise the name of the Lord, all these that are brethren meeting therein together.

In the holy Gospell, the Church is compared to a Sheepfold, whereof Iesus Christ is the Shepherd, and wherein the sheepe heare, and vnderstand the voice of their Shepherd; as Iohn 10. 1, 16 also in the Scripture, the Church is represented vnto vs, as a Bride well beloued of her Lord, and for the which Christ gaue himselfe, to the ende to sanctifie her, and to make her glorious, without spot or wrinkle, that shee might bee holy and vnreprooueable, as it becommeth her, to mount Sion, to the citie of the liuing God, to celestiaall Ierusalem, to the company of innumerable Angels, and to the assembly of the first borne, which are written in heauen, to God the Iudge of all, and to the spirits of iust and perfect men. For we are ioyned to this glorious company, and the to Angels, & Patriarkes, which beleued in the true God: by meanes of the Gospell, all these excellent titles being attributed to the Church, in regard of the elect, and all true beleeuers, whom the Lord knoweth and approoueth. For when the Scripture speaketh generally of all the visible Christian Church, and considereth the same in grosse and exteriorly, shee is compared to a great felde, that bringeth forth great store of corne diuersly, and wherein there is great store of tares or darnel, or to a draw net, which gathereth all kindes of fish. And in that sence the Apostle saith, That all are not Iewes which are Iewes outward. And Iesus Christ saith, Not euery one that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdome of heauen, but hee that doeth the will of my Father which is in heauen. Therefore, oh Lord God, seeing thou art the searcher of all mens hearts, to knowe and discerne who loueth and serueth thee as hee ought to doe, from hypocrites, and the true members of Christ and of his Church, from those which onely beare the name and title thereof, I beseech thee to vouchsafe mee the grace, to loue nothing more, then the so sweete and solitarie company of thee, oh Father, Sonne, and holy Spirit, and of all thy elect and faithfull children which dwell and are perpetually gathered together in thy holy temple, in such maner, that all the desire of my soule may be to go into thy tabernacle, and to dwell therein for euer. For what greater mischief can happen vnto me then to be put out, or deuiued of such company? Whosoever is not with thee, and in thy holy city, must of force be with Sathan and in the company of Diuels, that is, with all euill and mischiefe: for that, as thou giuest peace, felicity, and life to those which dwell in thy house, so the Diuel is the author of al euill & mischiefe, and lastly of eternal death to al those which follow his kingdome, working iniquity. For although (Oh our God and heavenly Father) thou diddest couenant, that thou woldest no more drown & destroy the world with water, and that from thence forth, as long as the world should last, seed time and haruest, cold, and heat, summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease. In conformation whereof, thou didst establishe the rainbow for a signe: Neuertheles, what is this poore life but a deluge of euils? But herein my soule is comforted, that euen then, when in thy great & most iust fury, thou didst send down great floods of raine vpon the earth, O good God by thy great fauour and mercy, thou didst abundantly shew forth thy admirable defence and protection from heauen vpon Noahs arke. For what was the cause that hee perished not with the rest of mankind? did he not see one selfe same deluge? did not the same waters fall vpon him? yes certainly. But in his little lodging of Gophar wood, he had thy promise, (O most puissant Lord) he had thy grace which protected him, in such manner that thousand thousands falling on his right hand, and as many on his left, he was safe vnder thy wings. So Lord, although that in this world, the cloudes of miseries falleth vpon the good and vpon the euill, and that both the one and the other die, we know that thou wilt saue, and make most happy those that are in the arke of thy Church. That is it which thou hast promised by the Prophet: saying, For a moment in myne anger I hid my face from thee for a little season. Neuerthelesse, as I haue sworne that the waters of Noah, should no more goe ouer the earth: so haue I sworne that I would not be angry with thee, or rebuke thee. For the mountaines shall remooue, and the hills shall fall downe, but my mercy shall not depart, neither the couenant of my peace fall away, saith the Lord, that hath compassion on thee. Whereof thou giuest vs a lively assurance in holy baptisme, therein shewing vs life and death, as in times past thou didst to Noah, shew death in the waters, and life in the Arke. As our sinnes are sufficient by the meanes of thy iust fury to drowne vs.

But on the other side also, when we are receiued into the fort of thy Sanctuary, (Oh Lord, which is the Church & ingrafted in thy Sonne Iesus Christ, by the sacred visible seale of his couenant, and shew the fruites of the same, in attestation of a good conscience before thee, (O Lord) by the resurrection of Christ, then we are saued and quickned, as it is sayd; Blessed are they that heare the word of God, and keepe it. And to what end is it to cast seede into the

the ground, if therein it taketh no roote, to spring and bring forth fruit? to what end or profit should wee build a house, if with the first winde that bloweth, it falleth downe againe? They loue mee (saith Christ) that haue my commaundements, and keepe them. But how shall we heare his voyce, if he pierceth not our eares, and openeth not our vnderstandings: for it is nothing to heare outwardly, if God speaketh not inwardly vnto vs, nor is not heard within our thoughts. Then great is thy mercy, (O celestial Father) seeing that the hearing and hauing of thy holy word, proceedeth not from vs, but from thy meere grace and benignitie. Therefore I beseech thee, to open my heart, that I may vnderstand the language of the holy Ghost in thy Schoole, as it once pleased thee to do vnto Lydia, whereof S. Luke speaketh, and proceed to execute and performe all that which thou hast promised for the conseruation of thy Church, vntil such time as being fully deliuered from all her enemies, thou makest her perfectly triumph in the kingdome of heauen.

10. Meditations vpon the tenne Commaundements.

The institution of Christian faith in the Catholike Church, is accompanied with an abridgement of the meanes how to honour and serue God, in certaine and singular precepts of holy life. For as to beleue in God, (Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost) is the true Religion: so to obey him, is the same and most commendable vertue, which leadeth the faithfull to eternall happinesse. To this end the Lord hath giuen vs his Law: for although that in the Gospel wee are freed from the rigour and curse which all men incore by not being able to fulfill the Law. Neuerthelesse, touching Righteousnesse, and the rule of living well, which is contained in the tenne Commaundements, which God gaue to Moses, for his people to obserue; they still remaine for a true paterne of a Christians life, to the end that hee may frame himselfe thereunto with all his heart. To that end it is said in the Church: Heare Israel, I am the Lord by God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage, Thou shalt haue no other Gods but me, or before mee, &c.

Exod. 20.
Deut. 5.

This Law comprehended in tenne Sentences or Commaundements, was receiued by Moses, in two Tables made of stone, which he witnesseth were wrought by God, and the writing in them ingraued with his hand. Therefore we consider all the Commandements in two parts: The first containing foure Commaundements, which specially concerne pietie, and our duetie therein towards God. The second hauing sixe Precepts, containing that which wee are bound to doe by loue towards our neighbours. At the beginning of all these Commaundements, God maketh a manner of a Preface, wherein hee attributeth to himselfe the authoritie to commaund, saying, Heare; and nameth himselfe Lord: which word in the Hebrew tongue signifieth Eternall, and creator of the world. Then he calleth himselfe God of his people, to make his doctrine more amiable, and namely in this, that hee deliuered them from the bondage of the Egyptians, teaching vs by that deliuerance made of the bodies of the Israelites, that hee hath also deliuered their soules, and the soules of all the faithfull, from the spirituall captiuitie of sinne, and from the tyrannie of the Denill: so it followeth, that it is great reason, that wee should yeeld all obedience vnto such a Deliuerer.

The first of the commaundements is, Thou shalt haue no other God but me, or before me: God herein requireth, that we should reserue vnto him onelie the honor and the glorie which belongeth vnto him, and not transport it else where. Which we doe, worshipping one God onely, calling vpon him, putting our trust in him, giving him thanks for all his benefites, and obseruing all such things as the Scripture teacheth vs to bee onely due to the eternall God.

The second precept, Thou shalt make to thy selfe no grauen Image, &c. Containeth the true mannerto worship God, (as Christ afterward said) in Spirit and truth, withdrawing vs from all superstitions and carnall manner of worship.

The third Commandement is Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord by God in vaine, where by God forbiddeth vs to abuse his name in any maner whatloeuere, and neuer to speak of his sacred name, but with feare and great humility, and to glorifie him.

The fourth Commandement, Remember thou keepe holy the Sabbath day, &c. The Ceremonie whereof, concerning the auncient law being abolished, the truth and substance thereof remaineth still with vs, as of all the rest and other Moisaicall figures and shadowes. Which bindeth vs religiously to obserue the order established in the Church, to serue God, to heare his word, to communicate at publike prayers, and at the holy Sacraments on the dayes appointed, ceasing from all other workes: and to conclude, to submit our selues wholly to the Spirituall and Ecclesiasticall policie.

The fift, Honour thy Father and thy Mother, &c. Whereby wee must vnderstand, that not onely children are bound to bee humble and obedient to their fathers and mothers, to honour and reuerence them, and to assist and serue them; but also all inferiour persons and subiects, are to doe the like vnto their superiours and Lordes, because the reason is all one and alike, which is, that God is the Authour of all preheminence and authoritie.

The sixt, Thou shalt not kill. By the which, seeing it is God that speaketh, wee must not thinke, that the Law is onely imposed vpon exterior workes, but specially also vpon the affections of our heart. And therefore with murther, God forbidderh all hatred, and malice, and a desire to do euill to any one whatsoever; yea, and it bindeth vs to loue our neighbour, and to doe him all the good that wee can, willingly, and without dissimulation.

The seuenth, Thou shalt not commit adultery. Which in effect is, that all concupiscence is accursed before God, and that therefore wee must abstaine from it, for so he instructeth vs by one kinde, generally to auoyd and shunne all vncleannesse and filthinesse, displeasing vnto the Holy of Holiest: And which is more, considering the nature of our Law-giuer, who being all Spirit, doeth not onely regard the outward worke, but penetrateth into the depth of our thoughts, wee ought to learne by this Precept, that seeing our bodies and our soules are temples of the holy Ghost, wee are to keepe and maintaine both the one and the other honestly, in such manner, that wee must be chaste in thought, word, and gesture, as well as in deed and worke.

The eighth Commandement, Thou shalt not steale. Wherein God not onely forbidderh vs all theft, which is punished by iustice, but also all euill trades, and vnlawfull meanes to draw vnto vs the goods of our neighbor, either by violence, or deceit, or in another maner contrary to Christian charitie, and which the holy Scripture no wayes alloweth. Wherein also wee must abstaine from will, as well as from deed, and every man in his vocation is to doe the best hee can, to preserue the goods of his neighbour.

The ninth Precept is, Thou shalt not beare false witness, &c. Wherein God naming one kinde onely, giueth this generall rule, That wee must not falsly speake euill of our neighbour, and that by detraction and lying wee must not hurt him, neither in his goods, nor in his good name; but doing the contrary, we must thinke well of him, as farre as truth requirerh and warranteth, and preserue his good report and credit as neere as we can.

The tenth and last Commandement, is Thou shalt not come thy neighbours house. Whereby God requirerh such manner of integritie in vs, that neuer any euill concupiscence, nor desire should enter into our hearts, to moue and stirre vs vp to euill, to the preiudice of our neighbour, but rather, that every man should bee content with his owne, and glorifie the Lord in his condition.

Let vs further note, that of these tenne Commandements of the law, wee haue a brieue summary set downe in the Gospell, wherein consisteth the true accomplishing of all righteousness, which is in these 2. points. That we loue God with all our hearts, with all our soules, and with all our strength, and our neighbour as our selues. It is true, that the infirmity of all flesh is such, that in this mortall body we can neuer attaine to that perfection, which is required herein. For the loue of God importeth, that wee should loue and honour him in thought and deed: as our Lord, Master, Father, and Saviour, which requireth feare, obedience, honor, and confidence, and that which is added (with all our heart, soule, and force,) vnderstandeth, that we should feare God, obey him, honour him, and put our trust and confidence in him, with such zeale, reuerence, seruency, and confidence, that in our imagination there should be no desire, no will, no study, nor any cogitations that should contradict this loue, which we should beare to God. Mat. 22. 37. 39

Touching the second point, the sence is, that as we are so naturally inclined, to loue our selues, that this affection surmounterh all others, so we should carry our selues in such sort towards our neighbours, that charitie should dwell in our hearts, to lead and induce vs to doe all the duties of loue vnto them, as brethren and children of one father: from thence taking the rule of all our actions and behaviours towards them. But being not able to obtaine this perfection, yet there is a certaine measure to approach neere vnto it, and which is pleasing vnto God, that is, when we studie by all meanes, to attaine vnto that perfection which is taught vs, in the holy Scriptures, continually inuoking the grace of the holy Ghost,

Ghost, that wee may increase in obedience of faith, and bee sorie for our infirmities, for so wee may bee well assured, that there is mercie for vs in Iesus Christ, from our Father which is in heauen.

II. A Prayer, to aske grace of God, to liue according to his word.

Pla. 94. 12, 13 Happy is that man whom thou chastenest (O Lord) and teachest him thy Law, that thou mayest giue him rest from the dayes of euill, while the pit is digged for the wicked. Then (oh eternall God) for as much as the way to heauen is taught vs in thy word, and that by so many testimonies of the Prophets and Apostles, wee vnderstand which is the right way to saluation; suffer mee not, I beseech thee, to bee lost, by wandring in the spacious high wayes of the world, following the counsell of the wicked, or the traditions and inuentions of men. Make mee to knowe, that all those that put not their trust onely in thee, and which goe out of the way which thy beloued Sonne hath made and troden for vs, are set in perillous and slippery places, to be throwen headlong into vtter ruine and desolation. And suffer not (Oh God) that in this pleasant way of life eternall, wherein by thy grace and mercie thou hast set mee, I should faile or bee negligent in my vocation, but rather that I may goe forward therein with a feruent zeale, to my liues end, that I may bee constant and firme in obedience towards thee, and that by a true faith I may bee able to surmount the scandalles and impeachments which Sathan presenteth vnto those that haue recourse vnto thee. Oh Father of the Elect, I know well that the best runners are oftentimes subiect to stumble: but I beseech thee keepe mee from stumbling; and if I fall, let thy powerfull hand relieue and raise mee vp, that feeling thy bountie and benignitie, I may with all my heart serue thee according to thy Commandements. Our Spirits naturally are so much hindred and withdrawn by the cares and vanities of the world, that wee are stubburner, and backwarder to walke in the wayes which thou commaundest vs, then brut beasts are to go the way which men direct them. But my hope is in thy vertue; it is thy ayde and assistance which I expect, that by thy powerfull Spirit, my weake spirit being vnburthened, & my heart at libertie, there may be nothing to stay me from walking in thy waies, & running in a Christian race, wholly dedicating my selfe vnto thy seruice. Happie is he, (oh Lord) that hath profited wel in thy Schole, wherein the Law of life is taught, & the holy Ghost governeth, which comforteth and strengtheneth vs against all afflictions and humane miseries, and also against death, shewing vs that we labour not in vaine, but for the crowne of incorruptible glorie. Graunt mee grace (oh mercifull God) so to goe on and perseuere in this course of life, that I may apprehend that excellent prize, and in the end attaine vnto thee.

Psal. 119. In this terrestriall pilgrimage wee desire to see thy face in thy holy Church (saith the Prophet) and it is partly shewed vnto vs in thy word: But oh, how happie shall wee bee, when it shall bee fully discovered vnto vs, at such time as in heauen wee shall contemplate and behold it in thy glory; and that wee shall see thee as thou art, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost: When wee shall neede neither Scriptures, Prophets, Sacraments, nor Figures: for then we shall enioy the true forme and presence of thy holy Maiestie. But while I expect and stay for this eternall blessednesse, sustaine my hope by faith in thy word, which is the light of my pathes; and in tribulation is sweeter and comfortabler to my heart, then hony in my mouth. Human reason (oh Lord) is an excellent light which thou hast giuen to man, but as it is obscured by his fall, it cannot shew vs the way which leadeth vs from sinne to righteousness, and from death to life. And those that haue no other light in their vnderstandings, perish like beasts. Therefore it pleased thee to haue a Church heere on earth, gathered together by the preaching of thy word. Illuminate my eyes to behold and see the spirituall magnificence of this thy House, that I may loue and affect it, and in such sort lighten mee, that am a stranger in this vallye of darkenesse, that seeing the paths of life eternall, in thy sacred decrees I may follow them, vntill I attaine to our true countrie, which is in heauen.

Math. 15. 13. Iesus Christ hath said, That euery plant, which thou, oh heauenly Father, hast not planted, shall be rooted out. Therefore, for as much as thy holy word is pure, and beareth good fruit, giue me grace to loue it with all my heart, and to meditate thereon day and night. And seeing thou thy selfe inuitest vs to the waters of life, which thou giuest vs for nothing, leade me to those riuers, and keepe my soule from being seduced by that enemy which soweth cockle and darnel darnell in thy fieldes; and giue mee the spirit of discretion, to prooue the spirits, that I may not bee borne away by all windes of false doctrines, and still retaine the true patterne of thy sauing wordes, which are in faith and loue in Iesus Christ. To prooue those that are thine, oftentimes thou sufferest euill plants to growe; but thou knowest thy time when to pull them vp by the rootes, and to manifest mens vntrueths, by the power of thy trueth. Therefore, oh most powerfull God, may it please thee to repress all those that make Sects and Schismes apart and partialities, and scandales against the true doctrine of the Gospel, and worke effectually in the holy ministry thereof, that all errors beeing rooted out of mens hearts, we may all like true Christians, with peace & concord, glorifie thy name al the daies of our liues. Let thy fauour abound vpon the people whom thou hast chosen, and now when it is as it were at the last, and the end of the time, when as (oh Lord) it seemeth, that the Sonne of Trueth is about to goe downe in the world, dwell with vs, and strengthen vs in the knowledge of thee, according to thy promise, neuer to forsake those that put their trust in thee. Amen.

12. Meditations and Prayers, touching the holy Sacrament of the Lords Supper, to present our selues worthily at the receiuing thereof.

Lord God, Father of the vniuersall world, the heauens cannot comprehend nor containe thee, and yet thou hast done this honour to vs which are thy creatures, to communicate with vs, and to enter into vs, poore wormes of the earth. What tongue can expresse, or thought conceiue thy admirable loue, in this, that to redeeme man, beeing a miserable sinner, and to make him happie and blessed for euer, diddest vouchsafe to let thy onely Sonne, the brightnesse of thy glorie, take humane flesh vpon him, and after that hee had shewed and taught vs the waie to heauen, hee was with great anguishes crucified, dead and buried, by himselfe making satisfaction for our sinnes; and which is more, that wee might haue this consolation and comfort, and the memorie of this great benefite alwaies present before our eies; as also to strengthen our faith, the same bodie of Iesus Christ, risen againe in glorie, should remaine with vs for food to eternall life? For thy word (oh eternall God) teacheth vs, that when our good Sauour did offer himselfe to shed his blood for the washing away, and remission of our sinnes, hee presented and ordained his blood for a sweet and sauing drinke, with the communication of his bodie, to bee mystically celebrated for euer in his Church, in remembrance of him: to the ende, that as not long before he had miraculously by his great power raised Lazarus from the dead: so by the institution and celebration of this great and most diuine Sacrament of bread and wine, our soules should bee nourished with the flesh and the blood of that Lambe without spot, to be freed from death which is the reward of sinne.

How great was the providence of our Lord and Sauour, to call vs to the communion of his bodie before he died; thereby to shew vs, that by death it should not bee destroyed, and that hee would neuer leaue nor forsake his Church! What a refreshing is it vnto vs, in this terrestriall pilgrimage, and how sweete a banquet, to eate the glorious flesh of Christ, and to drinke his precious blood, when by faith in his word, beeing ascended vp into heauen, his life insufereth it selfe into our soules by the vertue of his Spirit, to enrich vs with all his graces and celestiall benefites. Oh most blessed flocke, that hath so liberall a Shepherd, that will nourish it with his blood, that it may liue by his life. What consolation it is vnto vs in this vale of teares and miseries, therein to finde meate which perisheth not, and which maketh vs liue alwayes. For by this meanes, and with great efficacie, wee communicate with Iesus Christ (God and man) by his word, by faith, and by the Sacraments, vntill that in heauen, without exterior meanes, we shall eate that celestiall Bread, and drinke that holy Drinke, there filling our vnion with God, and full accomplishing of our blessednesse. Oh most desired day, wherein wee shall be fedde and satisfied with that living Bread at the Lords Table, with the Angels, that God may bee all in vs: and how happie are wee now, seeing that now already in Christ we taste the sweetnesse of this sacred Banquet, wherein wee shall see the Lord face to face, and shall bee filled with his glorie, in peace and ioy: For when we participate heere on earth the Body and Bloud of Iesus Christ, according to his Ordinance, we begin to liue in heauen.

Then, oh Lord my God, to the end, that following thy Commandement I may present my selfe worthily at this holy banquet of sacred meates, which the Angels admire and

honour, I beseech thee to purifie and cleanse my heart from all spots and vncleannesse, and therein to infuse thy loue, and all other celestiall graces, by the working of thy holy Spirit, to the end, that this day receiuing my Creator, I may increase in faith, and hope of my saluation, and in all holinesse and righteousness. I repent, and am sorrie for my sinnes past, and from hencefoorth desire to liue Christianly, according to thy word, my whole hope is in thy mercie, and I doe not seeke nor hope for saluation, but onely in thy Sonne the Saviour of the world. I desire simply in my vocation, to celebrate the memorie of the death of our Saviour, as hee hath ordained vs in his Church. I forsake and renounce all the workes of the flesh, and all enmitie and hatred, with a good intent and courage to walke in the waies, and workes of the holy Ghost, and to liue in peace and loue with my neighbours: I beleue in the promises which Iesus Christ, (the infallible Trueth) hath from his mouth pronounced; which are, that hee will truly make vs participants of his bodie, and of his blood, that wee may possesse it wholly, and in such manner, that beeing made flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones, hee may liue in vs, and wee in him eternally.

Graunt then, O my good, and most mercifull Father, that with a true sinceritie of heart, and a pure zeale, I may receiue so great a benefit of the same Iesus Christ, so that in a certaine faith, I may enioy him and all his benefites, even as hee beeing verie God, and verie man, is truly the living Bread descended from heauen, to quicken vs, and to make vs happie for euer. And that by this sacred misterie, I may truly participate the newe and eternall Testament, that is, the Couenant of grace, in such manner to perseuere in this happie societie of the bodie of my Saviour, that from him I may incessantly drawe force and life, and beeing vnited with him, I may also become one with thee, my Creator. In this manner I beseech thee, to giue mee the grace to celebrate with thy Church, the most holy memorie of our Lord, to exercise my selfe therein all the daies of my life, and to announce the benefit of his death, vntill hee commeth to iudge the world, in the resurrection of all flesh; to the end, that so receiuing this great Sacrament of his bodie, with a new encreasing of all goodnesse and celestiall benediction, with so much the greater confidence, I may call vpon thee, oh my God and Father, and more & more glorifie my selfe in thy mercies. So to thee, O eternall God, protector of thy people; to thee, O Christ, Saviour of the elect; to thee, O holy Spirit, Comforter of the afflicted; and to thee, O holy Trinitie, one onely and true God, bee honor, glorie, and praise for euer and euer. Amen.

Oh Lord my God, I giue thee praise and thanks from the bottome of my heart, because thou hast bestowed so great a benefit vpon me poore sinner, as to haue drawne and receiued me into the sacred Communion of thy Sonne Iesus Christ my Saviour. It pleased thee once to deliuer him to die, to giue life to thy children, and as to one of them this day thou giuest him living vnto me for meate and nourishment to eternall life. I beseech thee let not my indignity make the precious blood of Christ to be shed for me in vaine, and that it may be giuen me to drinke, that in it being washed and cleansed from all my sinnes, I may alwaies be quickened, as one of thine elect, and a member of thy Church, seeing that in it thou hast made me participate that heauenly bread, which thou doest not communicate but vnto thy elect.

Let me not be so wicked to abuse these sacred meates, the preparation whereof cost so deare to thy beloved Son Iesus Christ, nor become like vnto dogs which returne vnto their vomite, nor to hogs that wallow againe in the dung, but rather grant (Oh Lord) that increasing in true faith, which bringeth forth good works, & in other gifts of thy holy Spirit I may neuer forsake thy holie alliance. Whether should I goe, but onlie vnto thee, and that by my Saviour Iesus Christ which hath and doth teach vs the wordes of life eternal? Let it not be for a day, that the memorie of his passion and loue may present it selfe before mine eyes, but let it remaine engrauen in my heart for euer, that I may incessantly praise the redeemer of the world, because by his testament hee hath left vs the inheritance of heauen, giuing vs the precious earnest of the holie Sacrament of his bodie. And therefore I resigne my selfe wholly into thy hands (Oh glorious God) beeing resolved by the grace of thy holie Spirit, to goe on the course of my life ioyfullie, and with a good conscience before thee, that I may goe in peace to my graue when the time commeth, seeing that Christ is my life. Depart from mee, worldly delights, and all terrestriall meates, which conuert and change into gall and rottenesse; seeing that within my bowels I haue incorruptible meat, sweeter then hony, and which maketh mee immortall, that is, the bread of Angels, the bread of God, the bread of heauen, the bread which giueth life to the world, and which without signes and Sacraments, wee shall eate about in the kingdome of heauen in blessednesse for ever. Then to thee, O God my Creator; to thee, O Christ my Redeemer, and to thee, O holy Spirit, which by thy diuine vertue workest this holy and vnspeakeable coniunction of faithfull Christians, with the bodie of our Lord, and to thee onely God be honour and glory eternally. Amen.

14. Meditation and Prayer, touching the blessed life which God hath prepared for his children.

This life which God hath prepared for those that loue him, because hee loueth them, is made vnto his children in Iesus Christ, a quickening, and blessed life for ever, because in it there is all ioy without sadnesse, rest without labour, dignitie without feare, abundance without want, eternitie without corruption, tranquillitie without trouble, chastitie without concupiscence, beautie without spot, light without darknesse, health without anguish, constancie without varietie, peace without aduersarie, holinesse without inticement to sinne, patience without murmuring, and to bee short, perfect and perpetuall beatitude: A life full of science, knowledge, and loue of God: a life enioying the whole vision of his glory, & maiestie, in that peace which passeth all vnderstanding: a life which the thoughts of the Angels, and of all the blessed incessantly desired, and are satisfied by one spirit, with that living Bread of heauen, and with that permanent sacred meate to immortalitie, (Iesus Christ verie God and verie man) without whom the desire and satisfaction of this sweete nourishment ingendreth paine and trouble: a life wherein those that haue made their soules white with the blood of the immaculate Lambe, shall bee intire men, where Christ is the first borne among many brethren, and with him, as his members, and vnited vnto him, as to their head, and by him to God, the fountaine of life: A life I say, wherein the bodies of all the faithfull shall bee made incorruptible and spirituall: like that of our glorious Lord, and their soules, made all light, in the splendour of diuine glory, to contemplate the face of the Deitie, and so to enioy the soueraigne good of man: To be short, this life, wherein one onely God (Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost) shall bee all in his elect, who being adhered and vnited vnto him, shall be made immortall, in full contentment and perfect felicitie incessantly to sing the spirituall Hymne of praise and thanksgiving, Halleluiah, Saluation, and glorie, and honour, and power belong to the Lord our God. This is that life (O my God) whereunto my poore soule aspireth: it is the marke whereunto it aymeth, the ende whereunto it tendeth; this price I say, of the supernall vocation of the Saints in Iesus Christ, by his Spirit. To this inestimable price I direct my course: I hunt after the incorruptible crowne of Glorie of the elect, and the great day of the restoring of all creatures, wherein our bodies being quickened, shall be reioyned with our soules, to liue together a heauenly life with the Angels.

O most bright and admirable day of the glorious comming of the Lord; a perpetuall day, without any euening or night, wherein I shall heare a melodious voice of the praise, exaltation, and confession of the most holy Name of the eternall God; and which will say vnto mee, Enter into the ioy of the Lord thy God, in that palace of glorie, where all things are great, incomprehensible, and without number, with a peaceable delight, a pleasing felicitie, a happie eternitie, and a perpetuall blessednesse, in the euermourning light of the most high Deitie. Oh ioy about ioy, ioy infinitely surpassing all other ioy, and without the which there is no ioy, when shall I enter into thee, to see my God in his glorious Throne, in his most holy Maestie, in that new heauen, and in that new earth, which his most puissant hand hath prepared for Celestiall Ierusalem, whereof hee himselfe is the Temple, and the Lambe IESVS CHRIST, the eternall Sonne? Then I shall goe into that holy and sacred place, where thou dwellest, Oh Lord, and there without doubt I shall see that which eye hath not seen, eare hath not heard, and which neuer entred into the heart of man. I shall see these incomprehensible wonders, in that last day, wherein the most mightie Lord, iudging the quicke and the dead, will transforme our vile bodies, to make them like vnto his glorified body, by that force and efficacie, by the which all things are subiected vnto him. For then attaining to Christ (the perpetuall and infinite light) we shall see that great God face to face, and shall know him, as hee hath knowen vs, to bee filled with his glorie, without want of any outward thing that we can wish or desire, because then wee shall fully enioy our mercifull Lord, the soueraigne good, and the reward of the elect, the Scepter and Diadem of their ornament, and the perpetuall ioy inuironing their heads, as with a crowne of victorie, in vnspokeable peace, and continuing for euer. Thou art (O Lord God) this light, in whose light wee shall see light; that is, thee in thy selfe, in such sort, that in thine owne splendor beeing made all light, wee shall haue the sight of thy brightnesse; in the same to know thy truth and thy glorie, to know I say the power of the Father, the wisdom of the Sonne, and the vertue of the holy Ghost, in one Trinitie, of one inseparable and intire essence. Which knowledge is of such worth, that in it consisteth all the felicitie of the Angels, and of the Saints, the only guerdon of life eternall, the glorie of the blessed Spirits, their perpetuall comfort, the reward of their travels, the recompence of their labors, their rich rest, in a beautiful peace, and interior and exterior gladnesse, in the Paradise of God, in his holy citie, which aboundeth with blessednesse and delight for euer.

Therefore (O most cocquall and coeternal persons in one Trinitie) I beseech thee with all my soule, with all my mind, and with all my strength, that thou wilt be pleased, to suffer my heart to comfort and reioyce it selfe all the daies of my life, with firme assurance, one day to see thy glorie, when the gate of heauen shall bee opened vnto mee, to enter into the ioy of my Lord and my Redeemer. Behold me poore begger, which knock at thy doore (O most great Father) and thou hast said, Touch boldly the entrie into my house, knocke at my doore, and it shall be opened vnto thee. Now, seeing that my profoundest thoughts, the sound of my voice, and the teares of mine eyes, knocke and beate at the porch of thy Sanctuarie, and that all my affections, my vowes, and my desires are presented vnto thee and in thy presence. Turne not (O mercitull God) thy amiable face from mee, and withdraw not thy selfe from him, whom thou hast receiued and acknowledged for thy childe, and thy seruant, though he be a poore sinner. But rather benignly heare my praier, and lend mee thy comfortable hand, that it may defend mee from the sinking puddle of the world, and that hauing escaped from such a gulf, I may come to thee in life everlasting. May it please thee (O Father of the elect) to illuminate my ignorant youth, and despite not my crooked age, but causethy holy meditations to reioyce my bones, and renew my yeares, like the roiall Eagle, that with a most happie sight, I may rest in thy holy Tabernacle. Amen.

15. A Prayer to bee said by householders in the morning.

Our ayde and beginning is in the name of God which hath made heauen and earth.

O Lord God our Father, altogether good, altogether wise, and altogether powerfull, Creator and Moderator of all things, wee thy poore children and seruants, by the grace which it hath pleased thee to shew vs in Iesus Christ our Sauour, humbly prostrated here before thy face, giue thee thanks for all thy benefits, specially for that it hath pleased thee to suffer vs to passe ouer the last night vnder thy protection and safegard, to liue vntill this day. Wee confesse, that being miserable sinners, conceived and borne in iniquitie and corruption, and naturally inuoloped with darknesse, ignorance, and error, we are not worthie nor capable to present our selues, nor to lift vp our eyes vnto thee (O most high God) which art all righteousness and light. But according to thy great goodnesse, thou hast made vs a way to the throne of thy grace and mercie, by the shedding of the blood of our Lord Iesus Christ thy beloued Sonne, whom wee beleue in his word, (which the holy Ghost confirmeth in our hearts) took flesh of the blessed virgin Mary, died on the crosse for satisfaction of our sins, & rose again in glorie for our iustification and eternal blisse. We acknowledge, soueraigne Father, that it is a great effect of thy benignitie that wee which are vnworthy to liue vpon the earth, because of the hereditarie vice of Adam, & which by our offences haue deserued to be cast into the bottomles pit of hel, haue this good & benefit to see the brightness of the day & of the Sun, therein to behold the works of thy hands, and heere on earth to inioy the benefits of this world, which thou bestowest vpon vs. But, O Lord, for as much as that by thy abundant liberality, thou bestowest these benefits comonly on al men, & that the

Sunne

Sunne shineth as well on the euill, as on the good, and that this exterior light, serueth but for the guiding of our bodies, wee beseech thee, to send the quickening light of thy face vpon our soules, and by thy holy Spirit to drive away the darknesse of our vnderstandings: blessing and regenerating vs more and more to all righteousness and holinesse, that wee may walke, not onely this day, but all the time of our liues, in the way of saluation, in such manner, that our intents, actions, and thoughts may all tend to thy honour and glorie, and the edification and consolation of those whom we haue meanes to aid. To know thee onely and true God (Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost) is to liue happily, to serue thee is to reigne, and to praise thee, is the ioy of a faithfull soule. Grant then (to obtaine of thy great benig- nitie so many spirituall graces) that wee may haue an assured faith in thy word, a constant hope of life eternall, and an ardent desire to loue and feare thee, withall our heart and thought, and in thee louing our neighbours as our selues.

To doethis, quench in our soules, the excessiue loue wherewith naturally wee flatter our selues, and all other impure desires of the flesh, and the vanities of the world, and kindle in our hearts the pure fire of thy loue, which may make vs thirst after heavenly things, and tread terrestriall things vnder our feet. May it please thee also (most power- full God) to fortifie vs against all the temptations of the deuill, and to deliver vs from them, as also from all other earthly dangers, and humane miseries, which may happen vnto vs in this life, graunting vs the grace, in the shortnesse and afflictions of the same, alwaies to re- member, that the figure of the world, passeth away like a shadow, and like the flower in the field; to the end (O Lord) that wee may learne principally to seeke after thy kingdome, and the sanctification of our hearts; knowing, that all other things besides shall bee giuen vs of thee for our necessitie, to make vs liue contentedly, and to die happily, to enioy eternal life. All which graces necessarie for our saluation, that wee may haue them all of thee (gra- cious Father.) Freely pardon, we beseech thee, all our sinnes, in the name; and by the merits of thy deare Sonne Iesus Christ our Redeemer, as thou hast promised to thy children and seruants, who trusting in thy Iustice, and in the merite of his death and passion aske it of thee with all their hearts.

And although we are vnworthie, seeing it hath pleased thee to command vs to pray one for another, wee pray vnto thee for all men; to the end that those who as yet haue not the vnderstanding of the Gospel, by the preaching thereof, nor the illumination of the holy Ghost, may be brought into the way of heaven, which is to know thee the onely true God, and him whom thou hast sent Iesus Christ, for the saluation of the elect. And that those to whom thou hast already giuen that grace, as vnto vs, may daily encrease in thy spi- rituall blessings, that all of vs together may honour and worship thee with one heart, with one mouth, with one Spirit, with one Faith, and with one Baptisme. Likewise, we pray thee for all those whom thou visitest with any kinde of tribulations, either in body or in soule, that it may please thee, O mercifull Father, to giue them comfort and patience, vntill they bee follie eased of their griefes. May it please thee also by thy holy Spirit to gouerne, guide and direct the King, and all other Princes, Magistrates, and Superiors, that haue the govern- ment and rule of the sword of Iustice vpon earth, that raigoning and living in Pietie and Iustice, they may imploy their dominion and power for the exaltation of thy holy Name, and for the tranquillitie, peace, and quietnesse of their subiects, subiecting and submitting themselves and all their people, to thee, and to thy holy word. Which to publish in all pla- ces, it may please thee more and more to enrich the Pastors of thy Church with thy preci- ous gifts, and from day to day, to raise vp others for the edification and perfection of thy holy Temple, whereof generally, O Lord, may it please thee to shew thy selfe the most puissant Protector, to the confusion of the aduersaries of Christ, and of his Church. Hum- bly praying vnto thee for all these things, O God, with confidence to bee heard of thee ac- cording to thy promise, and in the praier which thy beloued Sonne hath taught vs, saying, Our Father which art in heauen, &c. Wee beseech thee also, Oh God, to encrease our faith, that it may take liuely roote in our hearts, to fructifie and increase in vs all righteousness, and good workes, and that thereof wee may all the daies of our liues, and at our last houre, make such a confession, as wee now doe, with heart and mouth, saying, I beleene in God the Father Almighty, &c. The blessing of God our Father, the peace of Iesus Christ our Sa- uiour, and the ioy of the holie Ghost be giuen vnto vs, and dwell with vs eternallie. Amen.

16. Grace or Prayer before meate.

All creatures attend and lookevpon thee, O Lord, thou giuest them meat in due season, and they receiue it, and are satisfied and fed at thy hands. We beseech thee, O Lord, to extend thy blessings vpon vs thy children and seruants, and sanctifie the food which at this present thou settest before vs, that wee may vse it soberly, according to thy will, for the sustaining of our bodies and liues, in the name, and to the glorie of thee, O Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost, one onely and true God, which liuest and reignest for euer and euer. Amen.

17. Grace or Prayer after meate.

Euery faithfull Christian ought to praise the Lord, and euery one should shew forth his glorie, because his mercie and trueth endureth for euer. So, O Lord God, wee giue thee thanks for all thy benefits, and specially for that it pleaseth thee to sustaine and feede vs in this corporal life, administering vnto vs al things necessary. But specially we thanke thee for the spirituall food of thy word, which thou giuest to our soules, that they may liue happily for euer, in Iesus Christ thy Sonne and our Redeemer, to whom with thee and the holy Ghost, one onely and true God, be honour and glorie for euer. Amen.

18. Prayer to be said by a household at night.

Oh Lord God our heavenly Father, to whom all glorie and praise belongeth, we know that thy people of Israel did euerie day euening and morning sacrifice vnto thee, as a thanksgiving for their rest, and of reconciliation with thee their God. But the true Lambe which taketh away the sinnes of the world, all figures being accomplished, hath taught vs in the Gospel, that a contrite and humble heart of a Christian, is a sacrifice pleasing vnto thee. Therefore in all humilitie and reuerence, we present our selues before thy face, giuing thee thanks, that it hath pleased thee to giue vs grace to passe this day vnder thy protection and safegard. Beseeching thee not to enter into iudgement with vs, nor to call vs thy creatures and poore wormes of the earth to account for our actions this day past: For wee haue offended thee many waies, and whensoever wee examine our consciences, they make vs culpable of death and damnation in hell: but as the childe hath recourse vnto the father, and the seruant to his master; so wee humble our selues before thee, O Lord, which art slow to anger, and of great compassion. May it please thee, O Lord, by thy great bountie and clemencie, to pardon our faults, and to couer them before thy face, with the righteousness of thy beloued Sonne, to the end, that as all things are now couered to our eies, by the darknesse of the night, for the rest of our bodies, so our soules may take their rest in our onely Saviour Iesus Christ.

Lord we know that Sathan compasseth vs about, like a roaring lion, that he is the Prince of darkenes, and seeketh to make a breach in our hearts, when we thinke not on him. But thou art the defence of Israel, which neuer sleepest, and that if thou beest with vs, who can be against vs? It is thou Oh Lord, that hath legions of Angels for the protection of those whom thou hast elected: we beleue and hope that we are of that number, by the mercie which it hath pleased thee to shew vnto vs. Giue vs grace we beseech thee this night to rest in peace, defend vs from all temptations, and pollutions, from all troublesome dreames and nightlie vnquietnes, & preserve vs from all danger that our bodies, by thy ordinance (O Lord) taking and receiuing quiet sleep, our spirits also may alwaies watch vnto thee, for the glorie of thy holie name, that so rising the next morning, we may be so much the better disposed to acknowledge thy bountie, and to glorifie thee as long as wee liue. For that in such maner going on with our course of life in Iesus Christ, we may with ioy of the holie Ghost, attend the happie, & most desired rest of life eternal, which is kept for vs in heauen, to enioie the same, after the sweet rest, which shal begiuen vs in our graues, when the Angel at the latter daie shall sound the trumpet to call vs into iudgement. But in the meane while that we comfort our selues with the expectation of that glorious resurrection, we recommend vnto thee, Oh heauēly Father, the peace & preseruatiō of thy Church, the state of this realme, and and all persons afflicted with any kinde of sicknesse, and tribulations, praying thee to giue vnto thy children and seruants that which thou knowest to be necessarie for them, that thy benignitie may shine and be seene in the middle of those that call vpon thy name; and haue their hope in thee. Heare vs, O Lord, for the loue of thy deare Sonne our Sauour Iesus Christ, in whose name we pray vnto thee as he hath taught vs; saying: Our Father which art in heauen, hallowed bee thy name, &c.

19. A short Prayer for euery particular person to say in the morning.

It is a good thing to praise thee, O Lord; and in the morning to extol thy mercies. Therefore I humbly prostrate my selfe before thy Maiestie, and lift vp my hart to thee my Father which art in heauen, giuing thee thanks for the benefits which hitherto thou hast vouchsafed to bestow vpon me, namely, the last night, which I past vnder thy keeping & protection. I beseech thee, that this day, & all the rest of my life, thou wilt continue thy fauours and blessings towards me thy seruant, and to increase my faith in thy Church, with other gifts of the holy Ghost; that vnder thy conduction I may walke in my vocation with a good conscience, and with such sinceritie of heart, as if it were not before men, to please them; but as in thy presence, to whom I am to yeeld an account of all my actions: and so like a good Christian I may goe on the rest of my life, with a peaceable spirit, and quiet conscience, to thy honor, and the good of my neighbors, as thou shalt giue me grace; at the last to die happily, in hope of the eternall life which Iesus Christ my Sauour hath obtained for me by his blood shedding. Forgive (O Father of mercie) all my offences, in the name of thy Sonne, in whose righteousness and merits, I haue and doe put all my trust and confidence, and for his sake, aid me in all my necessities, vntill such time as thou shalt take me as thy child, into the inheritance of the Saints. This which I aske of thee (& for al the faithful) with al other things necessary for thy glory and our saluation, in assurance to be heard of thee, I beseech thee to grant for Christ his sake, in whose name I continue my praier as he hath taught me saying: Our Father which art in heauen, &c.

20. A Prayer for a particular man at night.

It is a good thing to praise thee (O Lord) and to set forth thy mercy when night cometh, Therefore I humble my selfe before thy face, giuing thee thanks for the aide and fauour which it hath pleased thee to giue me this day past, wherein I might haue fallen into a thousand dangers and miseries, if it had not beene for thy paternall care, which thou hast vouchsafed to haue of mee thy poore seruant. But as by my fragility I haue offended thee manie waies, and that thy mercy infinitelie surpasseth all my vnrigheteousnesse, pardon (good Father) my sinnes in the name, and for the merits of Iesus Christ thy Sonne, and my Sauour in whose death and passion I put my whole trust and confidence. And seeing thou hast created the night for the rest of thy creatures, may it please thee therein to giue mee rest both in body and soule, against the subtiltie of Sathan, and of al others that would hurt me, that when daie cometh, I may so much the more extoll thy goodnes, and glorifie thee in my vocation, till that at the last I may attaine, to the true rest of eternall life, which is obtained and kept for me in Iesus Christ my redeemer. In whose name Oh Lord, I beseech thee to grant these things, and all others needfull for all the faithfull, as we are taught to pray vnto thee by the Sonne, saying: Our Father which art in heauen, &c.

21. A Prayer to be said by a sicke person.

O Lord God, most mighty and most good, we know that among the corrections, whereby thou puttest vs in mind of our duties, it pleaseth thee oftentimes to tame our flesh by diuers diseases. For then thou dost aduertise vs, by the paines that we feele & endure not only of our sinfull liues past, but also of the end thereof which euery one must suffer by death, as then also thou giust vs cause to think vpon the great & last day of thy iudgement, at which time we shal enter into a life eternall, which shal be ful of glory & blessednes for the good, & shame and torment for the wicked, which things the flesh liuing at ease, doth little regard. Now (Oh Lord most iust) it hath pleased thee at this time by sickenesse to humble this party, which heere lyeth sicke in his bed, making him to feelee and beare the seuerity of thy punishments, which also puts his soule in minde of his sinnes, and setteth the image of death before his face. Therefore, seeing thou commandest vs to pray one for another, wee humbly beseech thee, with this poore sicke person, that thou wilt not execute the rigor of thy iudgement vpon him, as hee hath deserued, but rather (mercifull Lord) cast thy eies of mercy vpon him, and beholding him as a childe redeemed from sinne, and death, by the blood of Iesus Christ thy deare sonne, giue him grace and constant courage humbly to receiue thy paternall visitation, and to beare it patiently and obediently, submitting himselfe with all his heart and minde to thy mercy, which layest this visitation vpon him. Aide him in all his paines, and be his warrant and protection against the dangers which assaile him: and speciall if his conscience doth accuse him of his secret sinnes: then (oh Lord full of mercy) set before him for a defence, the passion and the voluntary sacrifice of the Sauour of the world, specially of all the faithfull his elect, who vpon himselfe (hanging on the Crosse) bare our infirmities and weaknesse, and suffered the paines of death, being made sinne for vs, to wash vs in his blood, and to obtaine remission of our sinnes, and after rose againe to accomplish our iustification, and to open vnto vs the gate of the kingdome of heauen, as also to all those which beleue in him, being baptised in his name. Lord make this patient thy seruant, by the guist of Christian faith, to feelee the fruits and vertue of all thy great benefits, and that being oppressed with griefe and paine of body, for a firme consolation, he may in his soule receiue the true treasure of felicity, which is the remission of sinnes, through Iesus Christ. That this faith of the elect may be to him as a sure rampier against the astonishments of death, of Sathan, and of Hell, with assurance that Christ hath vanquished and overcome them for all Christians, members of the holy Church, to the ende that suffering with him, they may also bee glorified with him. May it please thee (oh heavenly father) to be mercifull vnto him, and if thou knowest that hee may yet profit in thy Church, among vs, preserve him from death, and giue him health with increase of thy graces. If not, (and that thou hast otherwise ordeined for him) receiue him vnto thee in peace, in thy glory, for he hath his recourse vnto thee (oh most mercifull God) instead of the death of the body, grant him the life of the soule, with thy angels, vntill that by the resurrection of all flesh, at the great day of the Lord hee may liue with him an intire man. So thy will bee done (oh Lord) in all and by all, as it is good and iust for ever: and grant vs our request in the name of the same Iesus Christ, and by the praier which hee hath taught vs saying, Our father which art in heauen, &c.

22. Meditations and Prayer fit to be said by him that feelet much paine by sicknesse.

My God, in my great paines and dolours I present my selfe before thee, I confesse and acknowledge mine owne weaknesse of nature, and the iustice and goodnesse of thy hand which visiteth me. The originall of all flesh consisteth in infection, his dwelling is a habitation of dust, full of vexations, sicknes, and griefes, his end is a prey to wormes, and all his glorie is buried with him in his winding sheete. It is the onely iewell of all the precious iewels and moueables, which the most puissant mortall creature carieth with him out of this world, with a coffin of wood, and a toombe of stone, to lay himselfe in a graue of sixe foot long. And neuerthelesse, man is so blind, that if he inioyeth any time of perfect health, the vanities of the world draw him hither and thither, make him wander out of the way of heauen, make him proud, and bereaue him of the knowledge of his owne fraile and weak condition. So haue I oftentimes found my selfe ready to suffer shipwracke in the seas of mens vaine desires. If thou (O my God and louing Father) in my chiefe glory, hadst not punished mee with the rods of tribulation, to prevent my destruction. As at this day it is thy pleasure againe to correct me by thy discipline, which maketh mee call to mind that I am a weak creature, to confesse my miserie, to humble my selfe, and to change my affections. My griefe is great, and hard to beare, but therby I haue cause the better to acknowledge, that thou art iust (O soueraign God) & good (O merciful Father) that in such maner healest and correctest my sinnes all with one medicine. For that the affliction which thou sendest vpon the body beeing well considered by thy children through thy grace in their hearts alwaies produceth the fruits of sanctification, and saluation with patience. Then, O thou vessel of earth, shadow of life, & mortal flesh, seeing God doth not send this paine and torment torment to hurt thee, but to the end, that it may be vnto thee an instruction, and a warning to amendment of life: put off thy selfe, to submit thy soule vnto God, and thy affections to thy spirit, and without ceasing. Humble thy selfe vnder his paternall hand, that hath given thee this grievous blow, vnder that most puissant arme, that hath throwen the stone to bruiſe thee, and vnder that great God, who beeing pitifull, seeth and heareth thee in thine afflictions, and which vnder his most iust decree, holdeth in his power the euill and the remedie, the trouble and the rest, and life and death, to make both the one and the other profitable and good for thee, and say with a contrite heart, full of hope and confidence, I haue sinned against thee (O my Creator and Sauour) I haue offended thee, and prouoked thee vnto anger a thousand times a day, I deserue to be well punished, and all the paines which I endure, are farre lighter then the weight of my faults: but thou art the God of compassion, and of my deliuerance. Thou hast washt, sanctified, and iustified me in thy beloved Sonne Iesus Christ, and in him thou wilt make me happy. Pardon mee in his name (O mercifull Father) all my sinnes, and comfort me in my griefe, wherein I want force. Let not thy comfort, and the vnction of thy Spirit, withdraw themselves from my poore soule, nor thy aid from thy languishing bodie. I beseech thee from the bottome of my thoughts, from the bitterness of my heart, and with thy seruant Dauid say, Lord heare my request, and let my cry come vnto thee, bide not thy face away from mee, in the day of my distresse. Let thine eares encline to my complaint, hasten thee and answer my demand; for my bones sticke to my flesh, by reason of mine anguish, and my daies vanish like smoke, and like a shadow which passeth away, and I am dried like a withered herbe. Lord, all my desire dependeth on thee, and my griefe is not hidden from thee: goe not backe from mee, come to helpe mee, I expect the effects of thy mercie. O mercifull God, accomplish that which thou hast said by thy Prophet, I haue heard thee in time conuenient, and succoured thee in the day of saluation: and while I endure paine, make (O most powerfull God) the force and abundance of the graces of thy holy Spirit, to dissolve the sharpnesse of my torment, and mollifie the bitterness of the euil which I feele: that in peace of soule and conscience, I may alway goe on my course in this life with this Christian assurance, that seeing it is thou (O mercifull God) that afflicteth me, it is for my good, and that my sorrow shall bee vnto mee as a watch, and a signe of some approaching ioy, and that to crowne all my miseries, the last of my most grievous daies, shall bee the first of my rest in life eternall.

23. Meditation and Prayer against the feare of death.

The thing which oftē admonisheth men to imbrace Iesus Christ & his word, as they shuld doe, is the feare of death. For this sentence of Christ (not to feare those that kil the bodie, and cannot kill the soule, but rather to feare him that hath power to cast both bodie and soule into hell fire) cannot penetrate into their hearts, by which sacred words in that poynt our Sauour sheweth what humane folly is: we feare death, for feare to loose our liues. But men cannot take it away from vs, then why do we feare it? for our life is in the hand of God, that hath given it vs, and if we endure any dolor and torments, it is not death that we feare, but those sorrowes and torments whereunto we are borne and ordained, (as a bird is to fly) which we ought as patientlie to beare, as a valiant souldier beareth his wounds, to be praised and rewarded for them afterward.

Math. 10. 28.

Touching our bodies, which are put into the graue, we should not esteeme them to bee lost, for nothing is lost therein, but corruption and infection, which we should desire to lose, but our bodies shall rise againe in glory. In such manner, as when we melt a piece of copper to make an image therof, the copper is not lost, but thereby purified and honored. And (as a Martir said) Seeing that by nature we are mortall, why doe we not esteeme it to bee a great honour to die for Christ? But let vs specially note the reason that Christ giueth, which is, that if we must feare death, we must feare the most dangerous, that is, eternall death, which God can giue vnto those that offend him, that is the second death, in the burning lake of fire and brimstone, which is the portion of the fearefull, incredulous, execrable, murderers, lecherous persons, poisoners, idolaters, and all lyers, as Saint Iohn saith. Then blessed are they that feare God, more then men. God asketh no great thing of vs, but that we should trust in him, and acknowledge him. The elements, the celestiall spheres, the earth, the trees, & the rivers shew foorth his glory, and birds also with their warbling notes. Then why should not man created after the image of God, prayse him? It is a small thing to God for vs to confesse him,

lib. 2. c. 10.

Psal. 19. & 148

but it importeth vs much more, that he acknowledgeth vs in his glory; and accepteth vs to be his. Lord thou art the authour of saluation and life, and therefore it was good reason, that man turning away from thee, which at the true life, was cast headlong into malediction, to be subiect to corporall and eternal death. For thy Deity being infinite, the offence committed against thee, could not receiue lesse then infinite punishment, as eternall paine prepared both for body and soule. It is true, that corporall death and the torment thereof, is such, that it cannot be comprehended by men, but onely when they feelee it, but the cause (Oh Lord) of such and so great mischiefe, is onely man himselfe, but pity and compassion is in thee, which art altogether essentiall benignity and mercy. And therefore from the beginning thou didst not refuse, to stretch forth thy more then Fatherly hand to Adam (the fountaine of death, giuing him an assurance of remedy, for his mortal wound, by the sentence of life promised vnto him. A sufficient comfort to restore and assure him in his miserie, but not to make him altogether exempt of the apprehension of his fall, and of the horror of the trespasse, ordained for all men, by an ineuitable iudgement. Euerie one feareth this condition, for in it is seene the testimony of thy iust anger, oh God, against sinne, and a certaine argument of the miserable estate of man, by their naturall corruption subiect to eternall torments, but death hath not the like effect in all men, but changeth his qualitie, being to the wicked and reprobates a beginning and an entrie into teares, and gnawing of teeth in Hell, and to all true Christians a beginning of solid ioy and perpetuall beatitude, to the which felicitie we cannot attaine but by death. Iesus Christ himselfe, by his example shewed vs, how fearefull a thing it is, for although he ouercame death, yet he trembled before he fought with it. And although he was chosen by thee (oh Father) to be the death of death, neuerthelesse by the teares which he shed, kee witnessed the pitie and compassion that he had of our deplorable condition.

Then how should not I doubt that feareful passage which made the most perfect and the most assured among the Saints to feare? for although death could not bee any waies hurtfull vnto them, they were in some sort moued thereat, and oftentimes shund it, praying to bee exempted from it. And what man is hee, that would not feare so cruell a paine? For in what thing can wee reckon the good of man to consist; but in this, that it is, and subsisteth to be perpetually happy? And what is death, but the destruction and dissolution of man? who therein is so miserable, that hee is neuer so much afflicted, as in that dissolution, wherein although he liueth to be tormented because of sinne, and although hee bee destroyed, yet he subsisteth without limit, and without end to receiue the fearefull assaults of the graue, which incessantly kill him without dying, in such maner that we may well say that he liueth eternally, so without any euill of his Essence, perpetually to feelee the dolours and paines of hideous death. Lord, this abasheth mee, and the apprehension of so miserable an estate maketh me afraid, vntill I thinke vpon the onely remedy, which thou hast ordained against so terrible a feare, (that is, Iesus Christ my Saviour) who onely hath vanquished death, by his righteousness, healing the wound of sinne, and by his obedience satisfying the diuine sentence, which holdeth man (without this onely meanes) bound fast to the horrible paines of hell. It is he onely that hath swallowed vp death in victorie, and that hath wholly broken his sling. It is hee, who rising by his owne force and vertue, (which is thine oh my God) hath quickned man, not onely assuring him against the feare of eternall death, but which hath giuen him an assurance of good, contrary to that so extreme euill of eternall death, giuing him in the flesh of that great Saviour, which is our proper substance, a certaine warrant of our resurrection. By this meanes (oh heavenly Father) I change my feare into trust and confidence, and my doubt into desire. For in me there is no more feare of eternall death, seeing my soule, beleeuing in the Sonne of God, before death, passeth from death to life, I doe no more feare corporall death, because in respect of me it is no more a paine inflicted vpon mee for sin, but a testimony of the goodness of God, who by that way will haue me enter into life, no more a destruction vnto mee, but a preparation made for me to attain to a better state, and to liue happilier, nor no more a subiect to despaire, but an argument of hope, that I shall see my Saviour in my flesh, participating with his life, to be with him without spot or wrinkle, feare of death, or vengeance for sinne: and to be short, it is to me a triall of the vertue of Christ, which said, Hee that beleueneth in me, I will raise him up at the latter day. Grant me grace (O Lord) that with an assured hope I may goe on that way, fortified by faith, accompanied by hope, and clothed with charitie, seeing that all the howers, the daies, the moneths, and the yeares of my life, are degrees degrees whereby I descend into the graue, to ascend vp to thy eternall glory. Learne me to know, that to liue from morning to night is a portiō of death, that I may make it more familiar vnto me: to make me to behold & contemplate the image of death in sleeping, that when I wake I may thinke vpon and remember the happy resurrection of all flesh: Make me to consider that night, is like the shadow of death, and that morning resembleth Iesus Christ which destroyeth & bringeth it to an end. In such maner, that on the one side I may humble my selfe in my fraile and weake condition, and an other side, I may triumph in the glory of my restoring to come, as the end of my death, and the beginning of my life, the issue of my miserie, and my entrance into happinesse, the end of my teares and troubles, and the beginning of my ioy and felicitie, & to be short my soueraign good. So that, at what time soeuer, it shall please thee to call me by death, (Oh my God and mercifull Father) I may ioyfully go vnto it, in Iesus Christ my Sauour, which liueth and reigneth with thee and the Holy Ghost eternally. Amen.

24. A Prayer to bee said by him which feeleth himselfe at the point of death, and which may also be dayly said by every one that is well and in health.

Oh Lord my God, most iust, and most mercifull, who of thy great loue didst suffer thy well beloued Sonne Iesus Christ, to die for my saluation, (which am a poore worme of the earth) I humbly beseech thee to giue me grace that the remembrance of the dolors and fruits of his passion, may neuer depart out of my heart and minde, to the ende, that vntill the last gaspe, I may be assured of thy loue towards mee: Oh mercifull God, which hast redeemed mee from sinne, from death, and from hell, by so precious a price, as the blood of Christ my Sauour, inrolling me thereby in the Church, and in the Communion of thy Saints. Behold not (O Lord) the offences which I have committed against thy holy Maiestie, which make me vnworthy of so many graces and fauours, which it hath pleased thee to bestow vpon me. I confesse that all my workes, being put into the ballance of iustice, are nothing but iniquitie and filthinesse. But remember that I am thy creature, borne and regenerated againe by Iesus Christ, for whose sake it pleaseth thee to be my Father, and by him (God become man among vs) to make mee mount vp vnto thee, and to make mee happy for euer. His righteousness is mine, by thy great loue: the promise thereof is sealed in my soule by the holy Ghost, I am baptised in thy name, nourished and quickned by the flesh and blood of thy Sonne, and beleue in thy Word. Assist (oh God in Trinitie) my infirmity, and therein let me not bee confounded by Sathan the enemy of my saluation, when he shall goe about to put me in distrust of thy mercy. I wholly referre my selfe thereunto, and will alwaies willingly leaue this fraile and contemptible life, to liue for euer with my Redeemer in celestiaall immortality. I am vnworthy thereof, but thy mercy (oh God) fully assureth mee, as one of thy elect; let thy mercy be a lampe to light me in the darkenesse of death, and by the gift of perseuerance in faith and hope of my saluation, make me approach vnto thee my God. Let the last words of Iesus Christ vpon the Crosse, bee also my last words, Into thy hands, oh Father, I commit my spirit, that thou mayest receiue me into glorie, for thou hast redeemed me, oh God, of truth: And forsake me not in my weakenesse, and when my strength shall faile mee: but when I cannot speake, Lord heare the desires of my dying heart and soule issuing out of my body, and let it interiorly heare that ioyfull voice which Christ vttered to the poore thiefe dying on the Crosse, saying, This day thou shalt bee with me in Paradise:

Most Holy, Pure, Good, Iust, Omnipotent, Of nothing in th'infinite the great
To wrath and anger slow, to mercy bent. And spacious world, and round about the same,
6 Instructed thus of God, he doth confesse The heauens, water, fire, and aire, did seate.
Three persons in a holy Trinitie, All which, and all that heaven and earth containe,
The Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, no lesse By's providence diuine, he doth maintaine.
In power diuine and heauenly Deity: 15 He doth to God the honor truly giue,
One of them then the other, yet all three T'haue made the world with euery other thing
Of them together, but one God to bee. And fishes, foules, beasts, wormes, therein that liue.
7 So hath he learn'd, that God by's power begat Subiected hath vnto mans gouerning.
His Sonne the Word, before the world begon And for him th'earth, fire, water, aire ordain'd, T'apeare, or any Essence had, and that Within the center of the world contained.
Both from the holy Father and the Sonne, 16 He knowes how out of matter without forme,
The holy Ghost doth equally proceed, And rude confused Chaos, without light,
As both of them by heauenly will decreed. God his great worke so admirable t'adorne,
8 He thinkes vpon the great inuisible Did make and frame that most resplendant light, Eternity, the authour of all blisse, Which now doth serue to light the world throughout,
In mans conceite incomprehensible, And by's diuine decree doth neere goe out.
Yet in him comprehends whatsoeuer is 17 He praiseth God that with admired art, Created. And can all things turne to naught: From that great light, the purest sparkes did take,
As of nothing, all things to light he brought. And thereof (fixing them in euery part 9 He doth alwaies the Trinitie adore, Of th'orient skies) the glistering starres did make.
Wherein are that the earthly globe was made, Whose vertues rare, diuine, and admirable,
The eternity resided, and before Are vnto humane kinde innumerable.

18 He doth admire and blesse that puissant Lord,
That alwaies without end to man doth speake
By's heavenly workes, which still with one accord,
By constant order (which they neuer breake)
Assistent are in their celestially robe, Vnto this admirable earthly globe.
19 His thoughts ascend, to the course circulare
Of th'asure globes, the which doe alwaies goe,
And swiftly wheele about the world, and are Appointed by the eternall so to doe.
But in such sort that though they turne alwaies,
Yet they doe it not, equally in daies.
20 Hee glorifieth God omnipotent,
The which the place most infinite ordaines,
Which heauen, th'aire, the fire element,
And waters high and low, in it containes,
And which hang altogether and apart,
As in a vault, by admirable Art.
21 Hee magnifieth God continually,
When hee beholds the heauens high and cleare,
Transparant, light, and bright perpetually,
Which maketh day light orderly appeare,
And in a five fold circulare round,
Incloseth and compasse all the world so round.
22 Hee blesseth God our heavenly Father deare,
Which placed hath the firmament about Great numbers of small Starres that shine most cleare,
And light, and beaure the same throughout:
And in each of the Sphaeres celestially
One greater light among so many small.
23 Hee knoweth that the same Maiesticke hand Hath made by Art, surpassing Art what's ere, Saturnus, Mars, and Iupiter, to stand,
Each one of them within a feuerall Spheare.
About the splendant circle of the Sonne,
And vnder Venus, Mercurie, and the Moone.
24 He sees how by diuine power vncontrol'd,
The Sonne continually doth make the day,
And compassing the world, his course doth hold,
(Perpetually to doe it without stay.)
Within three hundred threescore daies and five
And yearly doth his course againe reuiue.
25 He praiseth him that did create the Moone,
And Sunne, each one by turnes to make the day,
And night, so that as soone as day is done,
The night ensues, and when night's gone away
The day by course doth follow on amaine,
Which orderly, all mortall things maintaine.
26 Hee doth admire Gods great industrie,
Which limited the elements, and gaue
To them a place, fit for their qualitie,
And quantitie, the same for ere to haue
And hold, distributing to euery one
A part, the which it should possesse alone.
27 He knoweth that the Lord hath set the fire,
Next to the skies, and th'water, aire, and earth,
In distance lower, as nature doth require;
That all things which, doe breath life here on earth;
From them be instruct of nature might ingender
Their feuerall kindes, and God his glory render.
28 He seeth the three diuisions of the skies,
And knowes the reason of their feuerall state
Whereof the highest, next to th'asure skie Exceeds in heate, the lowest temperate:
That in the middle seated twixt them twaine
Is alwaies full of tempests stormes and raine.
29 He praiseth God that by his power sustaines
The christ'line warry dew within the sky,
(Which all the glistering starres in it containes,)
And by the same power also there on high,
By admirable meanes vpholds and throuds,
Great seas of waters in the volant clouds;

30 He wonders at Gods might, and powerfull hand.
Who with a finger doth vphold, and stayes
The great foundation both of sea and land,
And by's imperious word in like sort swaies
The elements, and easily without Paine, helpe, or aide, doth make them turne about.
31 His soule and senses all the Lord commend,
That giues force to the windes in euery place,
And diuersly to blow, and doth them send Throughout the world, and in a minute space
In feuerall places turnes them as he list,
For in his power their power doth consist.
32 He sees Gods mighty force by fearefull sound
Of thunder, which out of the skies we heare
Vpon the earth, as if he would confound
And cleane consume the world, in such a feare.
He puts mankinde, with admirable wonder,
When 'ere it please him on them to thunder.
33 He knowes that God within his hand holds fast
The thunder and commands the lightning cleare,
And both of them together in the wast
And spacious aire containeth, so that there
They cannot passe their bounds without his leaue, Least that they should mankinde of life bereaue.
34 He rendreth thanks to God for many great Effects gainst nature wrought by's puissant might In th'earth below, and heauen aboue to let Vs know his will (by some prodigious sight)
That he our sinnes doth punish certainly
By famine, plague, or other misery.
35 He lauds the Lord, that hath far ere decreed,
The daies, moneths, yeeres, and seasons of the yeere
In their due times in order to proceed
And follow each the other, euery yeere.
According to his will and first intent,
When he made man, the earth, and firmament.
36 In all things he giues thanks to God alone
That changeth times, and ages at his will,
And alreth daies, moneths, yeeres, and euery one
Of them, doth vse vnto our good or ill,
And yet though at his will he doth them change,
In him ther's no inconstancy nor change.
37 He seeth that God doth hold the waters fast
That they cannot orewhelme nor drowne the land
And holdeth captiue (in like sort) as fast
The blustering windes, in his most powerfull hand
And in each creature he doth life maintaine,
And at his will takes it from them againe.
38 He knowes that God by his power hath ordain'd,
The waters to keepe in a certaine place,
And then within their limit so contain'd,
That to exceede their bounds in any case
They cannot, for all things subiect are
To his most mightie prouidence and care.
39 He vnderstands that God by's powerfull hand
To make the earth yeeld fruit in feuerall kinds,
That all his creatures might finde foode on land:
Hath plac'd the Ocean Seas apart, and binds
Them so within their bounds, that they no more,
Shall drowne the land, as they had done before.
40 He giues to him the honour to haue form'd,
All creatures that vpon the earth doe dwell,
Wherewith abundantly it is adorn'd,
And vnto man, which doth them all excell,
Subiect hath Fish, Fowle, and euery beast,
Which hee commands, and they obey his heft;
41 He honours him in's prouidence and care,
For all the Fishes in the Ocean,
And for th'abundant sorts of birds that are Aboue in th'aire, and also that for man:
So many beasts of euery sort and kinde,
He hath created, as on th'earth wee finde.

42 He wonders at the sorts innumerable,
Of Fishes great and small which God hath made,
And much more at his power admirable,
For that no thing on earth is to be had.
But that the like for forme and shape wee see,
And daily finde, within the Sea to bee.
43 He knowes that God in's hand waighes mountains hie,
And doth the earth replenish with all kinde
Of flowers faire, which he doth beautifie,
With many severall colours as we finde,
B'experience in the Spring and Summer time,
When they come forth, and are in chiefest prime.
44 He praiseth God which makes nature produce,
And forme Pearles fire, and Christall shining bright,
Of liquid matter, (and good for the vse
Of man, wherein he takes so great delight)
Which in the bowels of the earth is found,
And in the Mines like vaines lies in the ground.
45 He doth extoll the glory of his name,
That doth in essence maintaine euery thing,
By him created, suffering not the same
To perish, but renewing euery thing,
When th'old decayes, and turnes into the earth,
The new reuiue, and from them take their birth.
46 He knowes the world was made by God on his,
Wherein so many creatures doe liue,
And vnderneath the starrie Canapie,
All exquisite and dainty things doth giue
Vnto mankind, to serue him for his vse,
While he liues here on earth, without abuse.
47 He doth admire and blesse Gods providence,
That did create the Angels good and free,
Light, beautifull, and his will and pretence
To know, and to performe the same, and the
His messengers, and guides to man in th' way
Of heauen, that they should not goe astray.
48 He magnifieth Gods most holy name,
That did make man, in whom we may behold
A modell of the world, and which did frame
The heauens, earth, aire, water, fire and cold.
Which things are altogether certainly,
A prooffe most perfect of the Deitie.

Of a happy life.

49 A True Christian Philosopher doth see
God in his Word, by his most sacred breath,
Infusing into man (though fraile hee bee)
The sparkes of grace diuine, whereby his death,
Is vnto him a certaine enterie,
Into the state of immortality.
50 Of life eternall he is full assur'd,
Because like to Gods Image he is made,
And by Christ Iesus (which for him endur'd Death on the Crosse, though no sinne in him had) Redeem'd from sinne, and so predestinate
For euer to enioy celestiall state.
51 Regenerate, and happy sure is hee
That doth receiue the holy Sacraments,
According to Gods most deuine decree,
And puts his trust in holy documents:
Submitting his will to the sacred writ
Of Christ, with all his heart obeying it.
52 He knoweth how at all times to remember Gods blessings, which to him he doth impart,
That for the same thanks to him he may render,
(As wee commended are) with mouth and heart,
With spirit, soule, and body God to serue,
That from all dangers doth vs still preferue.
53 He thinkes him happy that a member is Of holy Church, and doth obserue Gods will,
Which vnto vs a full assurance is,

Of his eternall blisse, for which he will
That we should loue him truly and confesse
His holy name, without all fainednesse.
54 He doth beleue that God by's wisedome knowes
All things, and sees into th' interior parts
Of mortall men, and also that he knowes,
The secrets, thoughts, and wishes of their hearts,
And so is moued to liue holily,
And to adore Gods heavenly Maiesty.
55 He onely thinkes him happy and most blest,
That doth with all his strength, his soule, and heart
Loue God in Iesus Christ, and doth protest,
From his most holy law nere to depart:
But to doe good as neere as ere he can
In all his actions vnto euery man.
56 He doth confesse that God most liberally,
Hath giuen him reason, senses, will and wit
To know his law and's great benignity,
And for access to him the benefite
Of prayer, which in Iesus Christ preferd,
He is assur'd of him to be heard.
57 He knowes how prone, and ready God's to heare
Our humble suites, when in our miserie
We doe submit our selues, and to forbear
His wrath, when with repentant hearts we cry
To him for grace, and pardon doe implore
In Iesus name, our onely Sauour.
58 He knowes that God is iust and mercifull,
And loueth those men that are good and pure,
To whom he is benigne and bountifull.
And how in iustice he cannot endure
The wicked man, whose punishment though he Defers a while, shall surely plagued be.
59 He neuer sleeps, but still stands sentinell
To watch his spirits, to euill wholly bent:
As also for, because hy knoweth well,
That's soule while it's in's fleshly prison's pent,
Is easily drawne to all infirmity,
And thereby brought in t'vter misery.
60 Being chaste, he doth th' exterior matter scorne,
Which altreth the senses by the eye,
And withall vertues doth himselfe adorne,
Which makes him like vnto the Deity.
And so transformes his mortall quality
By power diuine to immortality.
61 He's wife and doth not listen to the words
And writings of those men that vnder show
Of good, no goodnes vnto him affords.
But carefully doth reade Gods word to know,
His will therein assuredly to finde,
The truth reueald by God vnto mankind.
62 He constantly detests carnality,
And worldly pleasures all as enemies
To vertue, goodnes, and true piety,
Opposing gainst those crafty dangerous spies
The word of God written in his Testament,
Both old and new, their malice to preuent.
63 He neuer is surpris'd by the snares,
And wily baits of soule concupiscence,
As knowing well that God most iust nere spares,
To plague those men that with a bad pretence,
Commit such vile abominable things,
And them at last to vter ruine brings.
64 He alwaies puts his trust in God alone
That makes the weake against the strong preuaile, Turnes ill to good, and bitter teares and mone
To ioy, and makes our en'mies purpose faile, Conuerting the deuises of his mind,
Like smoke in th' aire, or to a blast of wind.
65 As he's Gods child, he doth to's law submit
His whole desire, his will, and his intent,
And vnto his good pleasure doth commit

Himselfe

Himselfe and all his actions fully bent

To serue one God in holy Trinitie, Abandoning all earthly vanitie.

66 Taught by the holy Ghost he doth pretend
To serue the Lord, and him t'extoll and praise, Assured, on day, when's mortall life doth ende,
To be ingraft in Christ, with him alwaies

To dwell in heavenly blisse, and to possesse,
A life compleate with ioy and happinesse.

67 His minde and thought is freed from worldly care,
And fleshly lusts, gainst which he makes defence,
And wholly doth his senses all prepare,
To serue th'eternall Lord, with full pretence,
His lawes t'obey opposing gainst his will,
The feare of God, which sinne in him doth kill.

68 Happy thereby, and blessed from aboue,
He wholly trusteth in Gods prouidence,
No plague, no warre, nor famine, can him moue
Nor feare of death, for God is his defence.

So constant is his resolution,
T'indure all kinde of tribulation.

69 Louing and fearing God with patient minde, Hee's comforted with such sweet fruits, as hee
Within the holy Word of God doth finde,
And in the Church are taught, so as while he Is heere one earth, he liueth happily
In Christ with God in all eternitie.

70 Taught by the Lord, he is not negligent
Nor careles oft to call vpon his name,
By praier vpon his knees most humbly bent,
Assured in his heart, that by the same,
He shall when Gods will is receiue and haue,
That which he of the Lord by praier doth craue.

71 His soule's inricht with great industry,
Because God in his loue doth still encrease,
His blessings on him, and continually,
To prosper all his labors doth not cease.

For that without his benediction,
Comfo rt in earthly riches there is none.

72 He thinkes it honor great and high renowne,
To beare the crosse of Christ, with ioyfull heart,
And for his sake with patience t'weare the crowne,
Of martyrdome thereby t'indure a part,
Of Christs most deare and precious passion
Suffered on earth for our saluation.

73 He doth contemne all earthly vanities,
Which with deceitfull baite, and great desire,
Of honour, riches, superfluities,
And worldly ioyes, which flesh and blood require,
Brings men vnto their graues with heauines,
Bereft of Gods eternall blessednes.

74 Within the glasse of true faith he doth see, (Abhorring vice) into the heauens aboue,
And there beholds his Sauour by whome he Hopes once to sit, through his great grace and loue:
Where both in soule and body really
He shall behold God in the Trinity.

75 In this hope he in God hath his deligh t,
But he that loues the world and earthly ioyes,
Doth shunne the day, and walketh in the night.
And those that follow after humane toyes, Erelasting death shall bee their portion:
To bring them headlong to destruction.

76 Hee knowes that Christ doeth liue eternally,
And therefore doubteth not that after death,
His body shall againe lye ioyfully,
And with his soule repoesse vitall breath,
To liue perpetually in heauen to see God face to face in glorious maiestie.

77 Hee shunnes and doth contemne terrestriall blisse, Ambition, pride, concupiscence, and all Things else, that make, and moue him t' doe amisse,

And drawes the vaine hearts of men naturall:

As with a baite to follow and desire,

That which at last will bring them to hell fire.

78 Hee calles to minde, that one day die he must,
And goe into the graue therein to rot,
And cleane consume, and turne againe to dust,
From whence hee came, and yet hee feareth not:

The stroke of death, as knowing that thereby Hee shall bee freed from all miserie.

79 He knowes his dayes here vpon earth are short,
And therefore doeth good ere hee descends
Downe to the place wherein there's no comfort, Assured that true heavenly blisse depends

Vpon faith, loue, and charitie, which wee
In Christ doe shew, while here on earth wee bee.

80 He knowes that Christ by death doth make vs liue;
And that his eies doe comfort send to all Mankind on earth, and to their soules doth giue
A Paradise of ioyes celestia l:

As also that he doth his Saints preferue,
From death and hell which men by sinne deserue.

81 And so he liues content, as knowing well,
That God is mercifull, and that he can Make him triumph ore sinne, ore death and hell,
By Christs death and his passion, which for man,
He suffered here on earth, and vanquish't all
Our deadly enemies terrestriall.

82 He doth beleue nothing on earth that is,
Exceeds, or can be fairer nor more rare,
Then heavenly and celestia l ioyes and blisse,
Which God of his great mercy doth prepare,
For them that loue and feare his holy name,
And faithfully in Christ call on the same.

83 His heart alwaies desires to see Gods face,
In heauen aboue, for euer there to fill
And feed his soule with his most heavenly grace;
Refusing all terrestriall ioyes, and still Doth meditate on that eternall blisse.

Which God in heauen, prepared hath for his;

84 With constant resolution he doth shun
And flie from carnall lust, which for a while Procures ioy to the flesh, but after soone
When short delight is past, doth him beguile:
And with shame worketh his confusion:
And finally his sole destruction.

85 His minde is bent with charitable desire,
To wish, and doe that's good to every one,
To pittie those that want, and helpe require,
And not to hurt, nor doe wrong t' any one.

As knowing that the Lord well pleased is,
With that which in Christ is so done by his.

86 Content with whatsoever God doth send,
He steemes all things in this world transitory,
Wau'ring, vaine, inconstant, whereof th'end,
Is sorrow, woe and extreame miserie.

And onely doth in mind and heart aspire,
To heavenly ioy, which is his whole desire.

87 With patient minde and wisdom from aboue,
He doth resist and withstand worldly lust,
Desiring, foule concupiscence t'remoue
Out of his heart, and wholly puts his trust,

In Gods most holy law the which he makes His study, and his pleasure therein takes.

88 As he is wise, he doth still meditate
On death, whereof he knowes he cannot misse,
That so he may the better intimate
His spirits to thinke on Christ and heavenly blisse, Assur'd that nothing's certainer then death,
Nor more vncertaine then the hower of death.

89 With constant resolution hee contemnes
All worldly ioyes, and pleasures, knowing well,
That hee which loueth them, himselfe condemnes,

- Not to deserue with Christ in heauen to dwell,
And shewes that's hart's posselt with vanitie,
And his delight is in iniquitie.
- 90 And so hath peace in conscience, taking care
Not to disturbe the same in any sort,
Reioycing at that benefit most rare,
On him by Christ bestow'd for his comfort.
A Iewell which more precious is then all
The treasures of this world terrestriall,
- 91 He meditateth day and night vpon
The holy law of God, which is his guide,
Here vpon earth, with resolution,
And full entent nere from the same to slide,
For vnto him it breedeth more delight,
Then worldly ioies, wherein man takes delight.
- 92 Reioycing in the same he humbly praies
The Lord to giue him wisdom from aboue,
And to direct and guide him in his waies,
Which hee with all his heart and soule doth loue.
As knowing that God neuer doth denie
To aide those that to him for helpe doe crie.
- 93 He is content with what fere God giues,
And praith him for's benefits most good,
Reposing trust in Christ, and while he liues,
Desires nothing but necessary food,
To maintaine life, and raiment to put on,
Vntill his time of dissolution.
- 94 As knowing that what care soere man takes
To gather and to hoord vp worldly wealth,
Tis not that, which him truly happy make,
Nor any waies to's soule procureth health.
Gods blessings onely which on him he sends,
Doth make him rich, and thereon he depends.
- 95 He trusts not in the great and high estate
Of men, nor yet in riches that are fraile,
Th'ill vse whereof makes man vnfortunate,
And in his greatest need of helpe to faile.
He onely doth in God repose his trust,
That can and will without doubt helpe the iust.
- 96 He doth respect reliefe from Christ aboue,
As knowing that most certainly his name,
Is in the booke of life, and that the loue
Of God is such, that he doth neuer blame
Him, that in Christ to serue him's alwaies prest,
But will reward him with eternall rest.
- 97 He knowes the man that is vpright and iust
Is happy, and assurde of heavenly blisse,
For he that feareth God, and puts his trust
In him alone, of aide shall neuer misse.
And he will blesse the man that in his sight,
With seruent zeale doth strue to liue vpright.
- 98 For he doth ground and build his faith vpon
The rocke of Christs, most holy Testament:
Which giues eternall life to every one,
That with a constant minde and true intent,
Doth serue God in the holy Trinitie
And to his power shuns iniquitie.
- 99 He knowes his life is thort, and euery day
Declineth, and's so full of miserie,
That he may well affirme and truly say,
That he's accurst, and no felicitie,
Is to be hoped for, by him at all,
If on the Lord in Christ he doth not call.
- 100 He doth beleue that God is alwaies proone,
And ready to heare those that that on him call,
And that in Christ he pardneth euery one
That with meeke heart vpon their knees doe fall,
And mercy craue, for his sake that's blood spilt;
Guilelesse vpon the Crosse, for our guilt.
- 101 Being holy he doth not his soule subiect
Vnder the yoke of foule concupiscence;
But viterly withstands, and doth reiect
- Such kinde of follie, and meere negligence
Of that which to mankind is pestilent,
And shorten's dayes that thereunto is bent.
- 102 Hee's taught that on earth to liue happily,
The loue of God should euermore remaine
Within his heart, thereby continually
To moue him his true honour to maintaine,
That all the world hath made and gouerneth,
And to each living thing giues vitall breath.
- 103 Hee knoweth that th'eternall gouerneth
By his crelasting power and prouidence
All things in heauen and earth, and saoureth
Him that with heart, soule, mind, and full pretence
Doth meditate on his most holy Writ, Obserues, and is obedient vnto it.
- 104 Hee followeth his vocation honestly,
In feare of God, and vprightnesse of heart,
Doth good to all, and nere doth falsifie
His promise, nor from his word will not start, Although vnto his detriment it were,
So much hee doth God honour, loue, and feare.
- 105 Hee praith God that giues him life on earth,
(Which should bee done likewise by euery one)
But much more doeth hee thanke him for's new birth,
And spirituall regeneration
In Iesus Christ, which by his holy spirit,
Made him Gods childe, eternall life inherit.
- 106 Therefore to Gods commandments he obayes,
And with heart, mouth, and soule continually Doth his most holy name extoll and praith
Which hee doth not neglect, but carefully
Doth follow his precepts in euery thing;
One God in Trinitie still worshipping.
- 107 Hee liueth soberly, and is content
With any thing that nature doth suffice:
For hee whose minde vnto excesse is bent,
Is prone to sinne, and shewes himselfe vnwise;
And doth fulfill the prouerbe true and old,
That without wine and good cheere loue is cold.
- 108 He knowes well that the wicked man gets nought
By pleasure which he takes in wicked deeds:
And that the ill which hee thereby hath wrought,
Attends him still, and from the same proceeds
The gilt of sinne, the which with terrour great,
Doth summon him before Gods iudgement seate.
- 109 He's taught by Gods word that his body is
The Temple of the holy Ghost, and that Being dead, to rise againe it certaine is,
And therefore vowes in Christ that him begat
In spirit, to serue the Lord spiritually,
The which by God's respected specially.
- 110 He vowes to Christ his heart, mouth, eyes, and eares,
To loue, confesse, to see, and heare his voice;
For with's eyes he sees Christ, with's eares he heares,
With's heart he loues, with's mouth hee doth reioyce
In God, and sings praise to his holy Name,
That hath him lences giuen to doe the same.
- 111 Hee doubteth not that God by's prouidence,
Most iust, most wise, and most omnipotent,
Doth gouerne, rule, and is the sole defence
Of all things both in th'earthly regiment,
And in the heauens aboue, where he doth raigne,
And in their essence doth them still maintaine.
- 112 Hee blesseth God, that most abundantly,
Out of the ocean of his treasure,
Distills on vs poore soules incessantly,
Whole seas of gifts and graces heavenly,
Wherewith hee blesseth those that doe him serue,
And both in life and death doth them preserue.
- 113 Hee often calls Gods heavenly loue to minde,
That doth the great assaults, attempts and wiles,
Which Sathan daily vseth 'gainst mankind,

And him thereby continually beguiles.)

Diuert and turne, contrary this pretence,
For of his Saints, he is the sure defence.

114 He doth direct his vows, and with heart praies,
To God the Lord, and to the Trinity,
The Father, Son, and holy Ghost alwaies,
Extolling the most heavenly Deity:

For all the mercies which from thence doe flow,
Th' effects whereof in's creatures plainly show.

Of afflictions.

115 Being truly wise he beareth patiently,
Such crosses as most commonly are layd,
On Christians, whom the most iust God to try Them, visiteth, and trusting in Gods ayde,
Doth ioyfully receiue correction,
At th' hand of God for his instruction.

116 He feares no hurt, nor stroake of death at all,
For being reform'd in heart, in tongue, in deed,
His spirit, voice, and cogitations all Depend on God, on whom he hath decreed,
To waite and to serue him while life doth last,
T'enioy eternall blisse when life is past.

117 No sicknes, no disease, nor pouerty,
Can once disturbe, or discontent his minde,
What ill soeuer, or aduersity
His body feelles, his soule doth comfort finde
In Christ, and he doth liue content in all Distresse and griefe, what's ere on him doth fall.

118 If in his daies, and time of mortall life
He hath no mondaine blisse, nor earthly ioy, (Which doth procure such warre and deadly strife,
In th'arts of men) he neuer feelles annoy,
But patiently endureth euery thing,
Without all worldly care or sorrowing.

119 If in griefe and distresse, he is condemn'd,
He knowes that God is ready to releue,
His troubled soule, yea though he were condemn'd:
To die yet doth he constantly beleue,
And trust that God in Christ will giue him life,
And keepe him safe in midst of mortall strife.

120 If ill for good be done to him, that ill
Turnes into good, for changing property,
It is good vnto him, because such ill
Supports and strengthens his infirmity,
And makes him strong and patient in that ill,
Which doth conuert and turne his mind from ill.

121 If he on this short life doth meditate,
He thinks the day which by death is ordain'd
To end his life and change his mortall state
Most happy, for that by God preordain'd,
He is assured, in heauen to possesse,
A life replete with ioy and happinesse.

122 If men by false report doe scandalise
His name, he knowes that God (the iudge of all Mankinde) will surely plague his enemies,
And them therefore vnto account will call,
And will conuert such infamy and blame,
To's honour, but to their disgrace and shame.

123 If th'iniury of the enuious man doth seeme
A burthen vnto him, and great disgrace,
He doth such wrong, and false report esteeme,
A sweet correction by Gods heavenly grace
Vpon him layde, for he that's wrongfully Accus'd, beares his wrongs contentedly.

124 If without cause of enemies great store
He findes himselfe to haue, he's not afraid,
But puts his trust in God, who euermore,
Is vnto his a sure defence and aide,
And doth th' vniust and wicked man correct,
With many plagues, and finally reiect.

125 If he be mou'd to see th' vniust man liue Vnpunish'd for a time (and that thereby
He waxeth proud, and for that cause doth giue Himselfe to sinne) he knoweth certainly,

That though God for a while his wrath doth stay,
He will sure plague him at the latter day.

126 If he by persecution chance to be
In danger of imprisonment, sword, or fire,
Or it in any other perill he Doth fall, he prayes to God, and doth desire

His ayde and helpe, for in extremity
Prayer is the meanes to ease his misery.

127 If he should be constrained to lose or leaue
His country, goods or lands, he is content,
For he knowes well, such vanities bereaue
Mankinde of blisse, and that he whose minde's bent
For transitory ioyes, to leaue Gods lawes, Vpon himselfe eternall vengeance draws.

128 If he by trauell feeles his body weake,
He doth not feed, nor keepe it daintily,
As knowing that whosoever doth not checke
And bridle fleshly motions thereby

Doth cause and moue vice in him to increase,
And contrary true vertue to decrease.

129 If marriage be a burthen to his minde,
He knowes that crosse, turnes vnto good to those
That patiently can beare what's ere they finde
To breed dislike, and that God blesseth those Which in the state of marriage liue together
Contentedly, and truly loue each other.

130 If want of issue giues him cause to grieve, (Sith marriage is for procreation Of children) he knowes that God doth giue
Them t'whom he will, and that a wicked sonne,
Ill nurured procures the fathers griefe,
A vertuous child his ioy, and his releefe.

131 If children, friends, or parents chance to die,
(As all men are ordained to die in th'end)
He is content, and beareth patiently,
What losse or crosse soeuer God doth send
In hope that they possesse that heavenly blisse, Which for th' elect by Christ prepared is.

132 If God to proue and try his patience,
Doth visit him with sicknes or distresse,
He trusts in him, which is his sole defence,
And neuer in his furie doth oppresse,

Nor laies more on's elect then they can beare.
Such is his loue to them, that him doe feare.

133 If for professing Christs most holy name,
He's persecuted by Gods enemies,
He doth esteeme't a blessing t'endure blame
For him that did his body sacrifice
Vpon the crosse for the redemption,
Of all Gods children by election.

134 If for his faith he suffereth martyrdom,
Nothing to him is more acceptable,
Esteeming it an honourable dome,
(Though to the world it seemes contemptible)
To be condemn'd for him to lose his life,
That by death purchast him eternall life.

135 If's body being ready to receiue,
The finall stroake of death by fire or sword,
Doth shake and him of courage cleane bereaue,
His soule by faith in Gods most holy word.

Doth comfort and assurance to him giue,
That he thereby with Christ for e're shall liue.

136 If doing well he's threatned to be kild,
Yet doth he not feare death, because he knowes,
That gods most holy will must be fulfilld,
And that it is a meannes (as Scripture shewes)
For him to dwell with Christ, that overcame Death, for all those that do confesse his name,

- 137 If the assaults of Diuel, world, and sinne,
By their exceeding tyrannie assaile
His body, by faith which his soule hath in Christ Iesus, he against them doth preuaile,
And with firme hope and certaine confidence,
Assures himselfe of Gods most sure defence.
- 138 If any tribulation vexes his minde,
Or that at th'oure of death he is afraid:
He knowes by th'one great comfort he shall finde,
And that the other is to him an aide,
And meanes t'eternall life, for without it,
He neuer can, nor shall attaine to it.
- 139 If famine, warre, or plague (things vñde by God To scourge vs for our finnes) doe him oppresse,
He doth submit himselfe vnto his rod,
And humbly on his knees with teares confesse
His finnes, thereby Gods anger to appease:
For Christs sake praying him his griefe to ease.
- 140 He knoweth that afflictions suffered,
With patience, to the elect is profitable,
And that which Christ for them hath merited,
Is vnto them so much available,
That thereby all their sorrow changed is,
Into eternall ioy and heavenly blis.
- 141 In miserie he calles to God on high
For mercy, and doth craue deliuerance,
With promise euermore to magnifie
His holy name, and's honour to aduance.
Assured that without doubt hee will soone
Releue and ease him in's affliction.
- 142 He knowes he is Gods childe b'adoption,
And so perswaded that by Christ being made Heire of Gods kingdom by election,
By diuine grace he neuer shall want aide,
Nor comfort in aduersitie whatsoere,
As long as hee the Lord doth serue and feare.
- 143 He feesles himselfe full of fragilitie,
And weake of spirit, affliction much to beare,
If Christ which aides the imbecilitie
Of poore afflicted soules, did him not reare,
And sustaine him in his deiection,
For of the elect h'is sole protection.
- 144 Patient, and well content, his faith is strong,
As knowing that the time is soone orepast,
That hee shall liue, and though the puerse wrong
Him neere so much, it will not alwaies last:
And confidently in God putting's trust,
Doth shun the wicked counsell of th'unjust.
- 145 He knoweth that those which are Gods elect,
By faith vpon his promises lay hold,
And when soeuer he doth them correct,
They are thereby so constant and so bold,
That humbly praising God therefore th'assure Themselves, that crosses good to them procure.
- 146 Afflicted by the Lord, he doth consider That hee in mercy punisheth his sinne:
And that with true repentance whensoeuer,
To call vpon his name hee doth begin:
He doth not onely pardon his misdeed,
But easeth and releueth him with speed.
- 147 He knoweth that the world by God was made,
And that life, death, time, and all other things,
Both good and bad, their Essence from him had,
And that he rules and gouerneth all things
By his most mighty power and providence,
Wherein he wholly puts his confidence.
- 148 In what estate soeuer, there's no thing,
More wished for by him, then that hee may,
With heart and voice (all sinne abandoning)
Giue honour due to God, both night and day:
And all his griefe his martyrdom, and feare,
With patient minde contentedly doth beare.
- 149 Being th' image of th'eternall, his desire
And sole delight, is to liue holily,
As Gods precepts and Christian faith require,
In all's afflictions calling humbly
Vpon the Lord, as it becomes the Saints,
When t'him they make their prayers and complaints.
- 150 If God on him for sinne doth crosses bring
With contrite heart and soule confessing it
He thanketh him therefore acknowledging,
His mercy, and his most great benefit,
In Christ, that sau'd him by his passion
From euerlasting condemnation.
- 151 When death from him doth take his vitall breath,
He knowes Christs power (which all power doth excell)
And's precious death and passion, orecome death
And vanquished the Diuell, sinne, and hell,
That he, and all that doe in him beleue,
In God with him eternally might liue.
- 152 Fooles in their fond imaginations vaine,
Perswade themselves that God looks not on vs,
And stops his eares when we to him complaine,
And that his fauor's drawne away from vs:
When roughly (with paternall loue, and zeale,
To try and to correct vs) he doth deale
- 153 But they know not, what ioy and comfort wee Receiue, by his corrections fauourable, Nor how sweet such reproofes vnto vs be,
Wherby our soules are made conformable,
Vnto his will, and cause vs to esteem t'
A happy state: though they contrary deemie't.
- 154 Each burthen's light, all tribulation's sweet,
To him that with a glad and ioyfull heart:
(When as it his chance therewith to meet,) Receiue it, and as it is his part
In humble wise submits himselfe vnto
What's ere it pleaseth God to him to doe.
- 155 It's every true, and faithfull Christians part,
To suffer persecution for Gods name,
To honour Iesus Christ with all his heart,
And for his sake t'endure all wrong and blame
With patience, for by aduersity,
We shall at last possesse th'eternity.
- 156 The liquor of thy mount celestiall, (Wherewith thou didst annoint the children three,
And sau'dst them when vpon thee they did call
In midst of flaming fire to let men see Thy power) is thy grace Oh heavenly Lord,
Which thou to thine at all times dost aford.
- 157 The reprobate and worldly man that nere,
Make any true vse of correction
Doe mocke at vs, and without any feare,
Of thee, flies from and shuns affliction.
Not knowing, neither seeing that by it,
Th'elect of God receiue great benefit.
- 158 By faith in our afflictions we behold
The Saints triumph in immortality,
(Their heads adorn'd with glistering crownes of gold)
About the throne of th'heavenly Deity.
With full assurance, once with them t'adore
Thy holy name in heauen, for euermore.
- 159 And so in thy great power and clemency
(Our ground of hope) by intire charity,
(The spring of life) and thy benignity,
In all our trouble and aduersity,
Our soules are fortified with confidence,
In thee oh Lord, that art our sole defence.
- 160 Wherefore dispising world and earthly ioy,
We doe expect the latter day of dome,
Wherewith our soules to their eternall ioy
With God shall be conioynd. This is the somme
And true effect of our Philosophy:
The fruits whereof is to liue happily.
